'the whole profit and advantage . . . accruing by reason of the . . . invention' to the patentees. (ii) The commissioners by virtue of their powers and control over the goods are more than mere agents, such as the customs house agents in Nobel's Explosives Co Ltd v Jones, Scott & Co⁴, who had merely obtained permission to discharge goods from ship to lighter on behalf of the owners of the goods. The commissioners here it is argued have such powers and control over the goods that they could and should forfeit them under s 44 of the Customs and Excise Act 1952 because entry is 'prohibited or restricted' within the meaning of the words in that section, by virtue of the Patents Act 1949 and the royal grant which that Act brings into operation in respect of the letters patent in question. By doing nothing and failing to forfeit the goods the commissioners are aiding and abetting the infringement, enabling the importers to perfect their infringement and constituting themselves joint tortfeasors with the importers.

The commissioners' case is simple and direct, there being, it is said, three reasons against the grant of the discovery asked for. (1) The commissioners can legally only use information which they receive in carrying out their functions under the Customs and Excise Act 1952 for purposes authorised by that Act. The court will not compel them to use such information for some purpose not so authorised. (2) It is not in the public interest that the commissioners should make this disclosure since, as the evidence of Sir Louis Petch states, this would hamper them in discharging their statutory duties effectively, because consignors and importers would tend to withhold information from or falsify information given to the commissioners if it was known that the latter were liable to be compelled to disclose such information to third parties. This was called the 'candour point'. (3) The commissioners even if they have power to disclose the information requested have no duty to the plaintiffs to disclose it and cannot be compelled to disclose it by the present proceedings. There are only two kinds of 'animal', as counsel for the commissioners put it, infringers or witnesses and the commissioners are not infringers. It is also said that such control or interest as they have does not make them more than mere witnesses in possible actions by the plaintiffs against importers. When statutory powers to obtain information for certain purposes are given such information can only be used for those purposes save in very exceptional circumstances, such as the detection or prevention of crime. The circumstances here are not such as to be an exception to the general rule.

It will be convenient before coming to what I consider the vital aspect of the matter to clear some of the contentions of both sides out of the way.

(A) The plaintiffs' argument that the commissioners are infringers because they make a profit, ground 2 (i), is in my judgment misconceived and must be rejected, although of course if I am wrong and the commissioners are infringers they would have no proper ground for refusing this discovery as it would be strictly relevant to the normal relief in a patent action, if Crown privilege does not prevent its disclosure. The Customs and Excise Act 1952 must if possible be read consistently with the Patents Act 1949 and the words of the royal grant and I do not see any difficulty in doing so. Schedule 6 to the Customs and Excise Act 1952 merely provides that the duty on patented goods should be calculated as if the goods were licensed, i.e. as if a proper royalty had been paid on them. Neither the Patents Act 1949 nor the Customs and Excise Act 1952 gives any rights to a patentee to recover from the commissioners any sum which might notionally represent such royalty in the case of unlicensed goods. In such a case the remedy of the patentees is against the owner or consignor of the goods if unlicensed and the fact that the duty charged on patented goods, whether licensed or not, may be higher than it might be if the goods were not patented, and has to be calculated as if they were licensed, does not seem to me to give any right to the patentees nor to put the commissioners in the position in the words of the grant of making a 'profit' out of the patent to the detriment of the patentees.

a The latter will still have their remedy for damages against the importer if the goods are unlicensed. I do not think it necessary to say any more on this point.

(B) What is the position in regard to infringement by the commissioners themselves? The commissioners do not own goods liable to duty and I think it is correct that they do not have legal possession of the goods passing through their hands although there may be times when they have de facto possession and can at any rate prevent goods being moved. They do not make, use, exercise or vend an invention
b in the case of these patented goods in the words of the grant. It is argued however that they infringe because the facts justify the allegation that they are aiding and abetting infringement as soon as they know, as they have been told, that the goods infringe and are therefore joint tortfeasors with importers, by enabling the latter to perfect what they have been warned by the plaintiffs are infringements of their patent. They ought in such circumstances, it is said, to forfeit the goods and c by not doing so aid and abet infringement and are joint tortfeasors. The point as to infringement is I think a bad one but I agree with counsel for the plaintiffs that it is not unarguable.

The argument as to forfeiture relies on s 44 and is dependent on establishing that the goods are 'prohibited or restricted goods' within the meaning of the section. The words of s 44 (b) are:

'Where . . . any goods are imported . . . contrary to any prohibition or restriction for the time being in force with respect thereto under or by virtue of any enactment'.

I do not consider it would be right to give these words such a broad meaning that they would include the general prohibition against infringement in the royal grant, which issues from the royal prerogative and not a statute. Forfeiture is a very serious matter from the point of view of the subject and any Act granting a right of forfeiture must in principle be construed strictly against the grantee of such right. The words are in my judgment intended to relate only to specific prohibitions or restrictions directed at particular goods or classes of goods specified by particular Acts. This intention is clear from the natural meaning of the whole section and from the use of the words
e 'with respect thereto' which direct attention to the particular goods in question. The various Acts set out in the note in 9 Halsbury's Statutes (3rd Edn) 91 already referred to, indicate the types of goods and enactments to which the section is directed, for example, deleterious seeds by virtue of the Plant Varieties and Seeds Act 1964, s 32 (6), certain dangerous drugs under the Drugs (Prevention of Misuse) Act 1964, s 5 (4), and in particular specified medicinal products or animal feeding stuffs (of which
f it is presumed furazolidone is not one) under the Medicines Act 1968, s 116 (1), (3).

If, as I think it is, the true construction of s 44 is as set out above, the basis for the plaintiffs' argument as to infringement has virtually gone and they are left only with a rather vague allegation of joint tortfeasance founded on inaction by refusal to disclose. This is to my mind not good enough to constitute them joint tortfeasors with the importers since there is no common design and the refusal is based on an honest belief that they are not by law entitled to disclose and I do not see how the commissioners even after notice can properly be said to have been in any way jointly responsible for the infringement which is in fact committed by the importer alone. Whether in the special circumstances they can be compelled by the court to disclose is another matter dealt with later.

(C) Crown privilege. It is next desirable to deal with this allegation, claimed in respect of documents in question, which are in Part 3 of Sch 1 to the commissioners' list of documents served 7th April 1970. The allegation if good would of course be a complete bar to the production of such documents in any circumstances whether the *Orr v Diaper*⁵ argument is valid or not. If however the *Orr v Diaper*⁵ argument is good then it is necessary to consider whether the claim to Crown privilege is justified and should be upheld. This is the 'candour point' as it was called in the argument. a

The basis of the claim for privilege is set out in para 8 of Sir Louis Petch's affidavit of 28th April 1971. It amounts to this, that the work of the commissioners in carrying out their statutory duties would be hampered and made more difficult if it became known to consignors and importers that information which they had under legal compulsion given to the commissioners about their goods could be the subject of disclosure to third parties. The affidavit goes as far as stating that, in Sir Louis Petch's view— b

'this would provide a strong and understandable incentive for consignors and importers to withhold information from or to give false information to the defendants, and would go far to destroy the good relations and confidence which at present usually exist between the [commissioners] and their officers and the traders with whom they have to deal.' c

Counsel for the plaintiffs made it clear that his clients were quite prepared that the discovery obtained from the documents in question should be limited strictly to the names and addresses of the importers in question. Since the basis of Sir Louis's view appears to be founded on the disclosure of information of a much wider nature than such limited disclosure would give it is not much in point. Apart from this, even if the wider class of information had to be disclosed it seems to me that Sir Louis's view is exaggerated. The suggestion that importers and consignors who are under a legal obligation to disclose correct information to the commissioners under pain of severe penalties would give false information seems to me to be highly unlikely, if limited disclosure, as is asked for here, were sometimes to be made to assist the administration of justice in special cases. d

However that may be, since the case of *Conway v Rimmer*⁶ the legal position of Crown privilege in respect of the disclosure of documents which are not in themselves of such a nature that, if disclosed, injury would be caused to the state, but for which privilege is claimed because they fall within a class of documents which the public interest, in the sense of the proper functioning of the public service, requires should be withheld from production, is now clear. The documents in question here are clearly 'class' documents, since no conceivable damage to the state could be caused by the disclosure of the name and address of an importer of a medicament for poultry. It is sufficient for present purposes to refer to the words of Lord Reid in the Conway v Rimmer case⁷: e

'I would therefore propose that the House ought now to decide that courts have and are entitled to exercise a power and duty to hold a balance between the public interest, as expressed by a Minister, to withhold certain documents or other evidence, and the public interest in ensuring the proper administration of justice. That does not mean that a court would reject a Minister's view: full weight must be given to it in every case, and if the Minister's reasons are of a character which judicial experience is not competent to weigh then the Minister's view must prevail; but experience has shown that reasons given for withholding whole classes of documents are often not of that character. For example a court is perfectly well able to assess the likelihood that, if the writer of a certain class of document knew that there was a chance that his report might be produced in legal proceedings, he would make a less full and candid report than he would otherwise have done.' f

And to those of Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest⁸: g

8 [1968] 1 All ER at 900, 901, [1968] AC at 971, 972 h

'In my view, it should now be made clear that whenever an objection is made to the production of a relevant document it is for the court to decide whether or not to uphold the objection. The inherent power of the court must include a power to ask for a clarification or an amplification of an objection to production, though the court will be careful not to impose a requirement which could only be met by divulging the very matters to which the objection related. The power of the court must also include a power to examine documents privately, a power, I think, which in practice should be sparingly exercised, but one which could operate as a safeguard for the executive in cases where a court is inclined to make an order for production though an objection is being pressed. I see no difference in principle between the consideration of what have been called the contents cases and the class cases. The principle which the courts will follow is that relevant documents normally liable to production will be withheld, if the public interest requires that they should be withheld. In many cases it will be plain that documents are within a class of documents which by their very nature ought not to be disclosed. Indeed, in the majority of cases I apprehend that a decision as to an objection will present no difficulty. The cases of difficulty will be those in which it will appear that, if there is non-disclosure, some injustice may result and that if there is disclosure the public interest may to some extent be affected prejudicially. The courts can and will recognise that a view honestly put forward by a Minister as to the public interest will be based on special knowledge and will be put forward by one who is charged with a special responsibility. As LORD RADCLIFFE said in the Glasgow Corpn. case⁹, the courts will not seek on a matter which is within the sphere and knowledge of a Minister to displace his view by their own; but where there is more than one aspect of the public interest to be considered it seems to me that a court, in reference to litigation pending before it, will be in the best position to decide where the weight of public interest predominates. I am convinced that the courts, with the independence which is their strength, can safely be entrusted with the duty of weighing all aspects of public interests and of private interests and of giving protection where it is found to be due.'

Applying these principles to the present case in my judgment if the documents in question are otherwise held to be liable to production they ought not to be prohibited from production on the ground that they fall within a class of documents which it is not in the public interest to disclose. Although there may be something in Sir Louis Petch's claim I feel it is one which judicial experience is competent to weigh and in my judgment, at any rate if disclosure is limited as asked, it is a claim which can have little weight when placed in the balance against the public interest in ensuring that the administration of justice is expeditiously dispatched and is not thwarted or delayed by the withholding of information, the disclosure of which can do no harm to anyone except those who are admitted wrongdoers. I do not therefore consider that the claim to Crown privilege in respect of these documents should be upheld if they are otherwise liable to production.

(D) *The Orr v Diaper*¹⁰ argument. The decision on this point is in my judgment the vital matter in the case and the various arguments of both sides not already dealt with will be disposed of in arriving at such decision. *Orr v Diaper*¹⁰ was a case tried in 1876, the decision being one of Hall V-C. It is very much in point, the decision seems eminently sensible and the case, so far as appeared from the argument before me, has never been overruled, distinguished or until now, adversely commented on. It is referred to in seven passages in *Bray on Discovery*¹¹, certainly with no disapproval, as being a case where discovery can in certain circumstances be sought against a party who is in possession of information for the purpose of obtaining the names of other persons against whom it is intended to bring an action. It was regarded by the learned author, afterwards Bray J, as one example of cases, of which there are a number, where the circumstances are such that an exception should be made to the general rule that no person without an interest could be made a defendant to a bill in Chancery for the purpose of discovery. By interest in this connection¹²—

'was meant such an interest as that a decree could be made against him or as that he might be affected by the decree.'

It is also referred to¹³ with apparent approval as still being good law for the proposition that an owner of a trade mark can obtain by discovery against a shipowner the names of consignors of infringing goods for the purpose of commencing actions against them.

The plaintiffs in the Orr case¹⁴ had had their rights invaded by third parties, exporters, whose names they did not know. The defendants were shippers of the exporters' goods which bore trade marks which were counterfeits of the plaintiffs' marks. The defendants refused when asked to give the names of the exporters and were sued for discovery. It was submitted that the defendants were mere witnesses, but Hall V-C said¹⁵:

'... but their position, they being the actual shippers, is different from that of mere witnesses. I think that the Plaintiffs do shew a title to sue. *Dixon v. Enoch*¹⁶ depended, no doubt, upon the construction of a statute, and the proceedings in that case were in their nature criminal. In *Carver v. Pinto Leite*¹⁷ the discovery was limited to a particular purpose. It was limited because the Court will not allow discovery for other purposes, and if the Court sees that all fair and legitimate purposes will be answered by a restricted discovery, it will so restrict it. In this case the Plaintiffs do not know, and cannot discover, who the persons are who have invaded their rights, and who may be said to have abstracted their property. Their proceedings have come to a dead lock, and it would be a denial of justice if means could not be found in this Court to assist the Plaintiffs. The demurrer must be overruled with costs, and the Defendants must put in their answer in one month.'

*Orr v Diaper*¹⁴ was cited in argument in *Hillman's Airways Ltd v Société Anonyme d'Editions Aéronautiques Internationales*¹⁸ which followed with approval the principle of *Dixon v Enoch*¹⁶ although the procedure by bill of discovery had been superseded since the Common Law Procedure Act 1854. *Dixon v Enoch*¹⁶ is itself referred to by Hall V-C at the start of his judgment with approval of the common sense view that in a proper case a plaintiff should be able by discovery to get the names of persons who had committed a tort against him. It was submitted by counsel for the commissioners that this reference to *Dixon v Enoch*¹⁶ at the start of his judgment showed that Hall V-C had come to his decision in the *Orr*¹⁴ case thinking that *Dixon v Enoch*¹⁶ was a case of general application and not based on the particular statute¹⁹. This is quite clearly not so from the reference already quoted¹⁵ where Hall V-C makes it clear that he realised that *Dixon v Enoch*¹⁶ was based on the statute. The Orr case¹⁴ was tried in 1876 but the wrongful export had taken place in 1874, that is a before there was any question of a right given by statute to have goods infringing trade marks stopped at ports, such as s 16 of the Merchandise Marks Act 1887 and subsequent Acts. The register of trade marks was in fact first established by the Trade Marks Registration Act 1875 and itself gave no such rights. Although according to the authority of *Upmann v Elkan*²⁰ referred to hereafter it seems that it might have been argued that the defendants, Diaper, themselves had infringed the trade mark by what they did, namely by shipping the goods to the order of third parties, b and counsel for the commissioners relied on this argument, it is clear that no such claim was made in the proceedings and this case does not seem to have been decided on that assumption. On the other hand, although again the report does not show that the point was in fact taken, it might well have been argued that a decree against the exporters including inter alia an order for delivery up of the goods would indeed have affected Diaper through whose hands the goods were passing for reward. c It seems that some such consideration may well have been in Hall V-C's mind when he said¹:

d Be that as it may, it seems to me that *Orr v Diaper*² is an authority supporting the proposition that in proper circumstances an action will lie against an 'interested' party to make him discover the names of person who from the facts must be presumed to be wrongdoers, even if the only order which can be successfully made against him is based on that discovery.

The other case strongly relied on by the plaintiffs was *Upmann v Elkan*³. This case was in 1871. The defendants, Elkan, a firm of forwarding agents in London, received e from correspondents abroad a case of cigars bearing an infringing trade mark label. On the forgery being brought to their notice by the plaintiffs the defendants gave full information to the plaintiffs as to how the goods came into their possession. When they were sued they submitted to act as the court should direct and, on giving an undertaking to give notice to the plaintiffs of the facts if any further boxes bearing f the false mark were consigned to them, they were not ordered to pay costs. The St Katharine's Dock Co were also made defendants in that action but no charge was made against them or costs asked for. The case is cited for the principles to be derived from the words of Lord Romilly MR⁴:

'I begin by assuming (which facts are proved here) that the correspondent of a London house sends goods to a London dock company to the order of that g London house, and that the goods have on them the spurious trade-mark or brand of a person to whom the goods do not belong, and who has not been concerned in sending them thither. The person whose trade-mark is fraudulently imitated ascertains this fact before the goods leave the dock: he applies to the dock company not to allow them to leave the dock with the spurious trade-mark, and he applies to the persons at whose order they stand, and asks them to give h him all information respecting them, and to undertake not to sell or distribute the goods until the spurious brand is removed. I assume, then, in addition, that the person so applied to is innocent and ignorant of the fraud. It is his duty at once to give all the information required, and to undertake that the goods shall not be removed or dealt with until the spurious brand has been removed, and to offer to give all facilities to the person injured for that purpose... It will j not do for him [the defendant Elkan] to say, as he does in this case, "I know nothing about the goods sent. I do not know whether they have any, or, if any, what brand on them, or whose it is." It is his duty to know this, and if he receives notice that they bear a fraudulent imitation of another man's brand, he ought to ascertain this as speedily as possible after such notice, and to take the proper and necessary steps to prevent their being disposed of in that state. It may be that without notice, and when he sees the trade mark, he does not know that it belongs to another; if so, he may deal with them innocently; but as soon as he is informed of the fact, he should act at once, so as not to be in any event, either from wilful or from accidental ignorance, made a party to the fraud committed by another; and when he ascertains the fact he should at once inform his correspondent abroad . . . In fact, in many respects the position of the dock company does not differ from his. For all acts done in ignorance they are excusable, but as soon as they receive notice of the fraud, and either by bill filed or by Plaintiff's indemnity the dock company is protected, they must retain the goods until the question is determined, and if proved, the brand removed.'

3 (1871) LR 12 Eq 140, on appeal, (1871) 7 Ch App 130

This case is cited as an authority that not only the defendants, Elkan, who were admitted by counsel for the plaintiffs to be infringers, were liable to give full information to the plaintiffs but so also was the dock company, who were sued but against whom no charge was made or substantive relief asked.

The plaintiffs resting primarily on these two cases argue that they are entitled to discovery here because the commissioners are certainly more than mere witnesses and in some respects have more control over the goods than Diaper and certainly more than the dock company in *Upmann v Elkan*⁵, nonetheless in both those cases it was thought proper that discovery should be given.

Counsel for the commissioners first point is that there is a 'rule' that the commissioners cannot legally use this information for purposes other than those for which it is collected unless there is some statute authorising them to do so. In this connection he referred also to the Finance Act 1967, s 3, which must be read with the Customs and Excise Act 1952 and which gives specific powers to the commissioners to disclose certain information about imports on notification by the Secretary of State. The Finance Act 1967 specifically by s 3 (3) excludes the price of goods and the name of the importer of goods from information which may be so given. This says counsel for the commissioners strongly supports his argument. The so-called rule against disclosure in my judgment, although undoubtedly salutary and normally followed in practice, cannot be absolute and indeed counsel for the commissioners qualified it himself by saying that in the case of crime it must be relaxed. The Finance Act 1967 is in my judgment intended to authorise the commissioners to give to others when directed what they properly regard as confidential information about importers' activities which should not normally be disclosed. This Act cannot however by implication overrule the right of the court to direct that discovery of these or any other relevant matters should be given in what the court considers to be a proper case. The position is analogous to that of banker and customer where the court has power to require disclosure in a proper case such as *Tournier v National Provincial and Union Bank of England*⁶ per Bankes LJ⁷. *Orr v Diaper*⁸ and *Upmann v Elkan*⁵ are authorities to the contrary where no statute is involved and show that in special circumstances information about third parties which would normally be classed as confidential may have to be and in a proper case must be disclosed. I do not think that the fact that the confidential information has been obtained as a a result of statutory powers rather than in some other way makes any difference to the circumstances under which it should be retained or disclosed as the case may be. This is supported by the recent decision of Forbes J in *Alfred Crompton Amusement Machines Ltd v Comrs of Customs and Excise*⁹, where the same argument as to a 'general rule' was put to him. He says:

b 'The argument as I understood it was this. There is a number of statutes where Parliament has given the Commissioners and other bodies in a like situation, the power to disclose information collected by the exercise of statutory powers. These provisions, it is said, are only necessary because there is a general rule that information in the hands of a government department cannot by law be disclosed without some enabling enactment, so long, at any rate, as that c information has been obtained by use of statutory powers. This general rule, it is said, may be deduced inferentially from the provisions in the statutes.'

He then sets out the relevant provisions of the statutes in question, deals with them individually and rejects the argument that there is such a general rule. I reject it also for the reasons which he gives and for those I have set out above.

d Counsel for the commissioners then cited a number of cases in order of dates, some of which had already been cited by counsel for the plaintiffs to show that the true proposition is that, as stated earlier there are only two classes of person: infringers and witnesses, and that although discovery material to the relief prayed can be obtained against the former it can never be obtained against the latter.

e These cases started with the *Queen of Portugal v Glyn*¹⁰, included *Upmann v Elkan*¹¹ and *Orr v Diaper*¹² and a large number of other cases. Some of these such as *Hope v Brash*¹³, *Edmondson v Birch & Co Ltd*¹⁴ and *Plymouth Mutual Co-operative & Industrial Society Ltd v Traders Publishing Assn Ltd*¹⁵ are libel cases showing that the court will not order a defendant to make discovery of the name of the persons from whom the information which formed the basis of the libel was obtained. Others such as the

f Queen of Portugal case¹⁰, *Carver v Pinto Leite*¹⁶, *Elder v Carter, ex parte Slide & Spur Gold Mining Co*¹⁷, *Burchard v Macfarlane, ex parte Tindall*¹⁸ and *Panthalu v Ramnord Research Laboratories Ltd*¹⁹, deal with the cases where production of documents generally, and in particular when ancillary to the evidence of a witness, will or will not be ordered. The general principles are that a plaintiff cannot make a mere witness (the emphasis is mine) a party to an action in order to get discovery from him, but it is also clear that, as was held in Panthalu's case¹⁹, there are cases where the court

g has power to order production of documents by a witness, in that case to be examined on commission under the Evidence by Commission Act 1859, because those documents were direct testimony relevant to the main issue for trial in the action. In the present case the names of importers are relevant to the issue whether any particular consignments are licensed or not, an issue still outstanding. Equally of course discovery will not be ordered if it can be used in a way prejudicial to a defendant's trade h and if at the same time it is not likely to assist the plaintiff in making out his case, nor where, as in *Burstall v Beyfus*²⁰, solicitors were joined as parties, although no reasonable causes of action could be shown against them, for the purpose of costs or discovery. The remaining cases such as *Murray v Clayton*¹, *Upmann v Forester*² and *Saccharin Corp'n Ltd v Chemicals & Drugs Co Ltd*³ are all cases where discovery of names of customers or third parties was granted but, as counsel for the commissioners submitted, these were all cases where it was established that a wrong had been committed and the discovery was ancillary to relief such as an account of profits.

Having given these cases careful consideration they seem to me to show that in general it is correct that no independent action for discovery lies against a party against whom no reasonable cause of action can be alleged or who is in the position of a mere witness in the strict sense. This is the normal rule but there is nothing in them which shows that the rule is invariable and is to be understood as excluding cases such as *Orr v Diaper*⁴ or *Upmann v Elkan*⁵ or indeed *Panthalu v Ramnord*⁶ where it can properly be said that the evidence may be relevant to an issue in the main action. In my judgment it is impossible to catalogue in detail the cases where discovery in special cases should be allowed and it is enough to say that there are special cases where, in the words of Bray⁷, the person sued has 'such an interest as that a decree could be made against him or as that he might be affected by the decree'. Furthermore the public interest must in my judgment also be considered. This demands on the one hand that discovery which is merely fishing or which is primarily for the purpose of damaging the defendant's legitimate business and not to assist the plaintiff should not be allowed, but equally it is in the public interest that discovery which aids the proper and expeditious administration of justice should be allowed. Cases of infringement of trade marks, copyright, and letters patent have always been regarded as cases where the public should be made aware that such infringement, even if, as sometimes happens, it is not deliberately committed, should be discouraged. For this reason a plaintiff is entitled to move in open court for an injunction and costs even if prior to the hearing the defendant has offered an undertaking which is in all respects equivalent to the injunction sought. Such cases are therefore exceptional in this respect. The present case, as already stated, is exceptional also in that the main issues, namely, validity and the chemical nature of the infringement, so that it can be seen to fall within the valid claim, are clear on the record. The only possible outstanding point is whether any particular consignment is licensed and that is a thing the plaintiffs will immediately be able to prove or disprove when they know who the importers are. It seems to me that in order that justice may be done and done as speedily and cheaply as possible thus avoiding the cost of extensive further enquiries by the plaintiffs it is highly desirable that the short cut should be taken and the commissioners made to disclose the names in question.

If a potential plaintiff is able, without demur, as he is, to obtain from the police the name of someone whose car has been in collision with his, why should not a potential plaintiff in an infringement action be able to obtain the name of an admitted infringer from the commissioners. As a practical matter both cases are in principle analogous, although the former may be ultimately derived from a statute, such as s 27 of the Vehicle and Driving Licences Act 1969 which makes records as to registration admissible in evidence, and if the interests of justice demand it in the one case a why should they not demand it in the other. In my judgment they do and I think the discovery asked for here should, in the discretion of the court, be given and I make an order accordingly limited to the names and addresses of the importers in question.

I would only add that the evidence of the plaintiffs shows that if these proceedings had taken place in the USA it seems there could be very little argument against the grant of discovery in this case. It was said by counsel for the commissioners that I was really being asked to amend the law so as to assimilate it to that in the USA. b Although it may be desirable that the matter should in future be regulated in this country also by statute and this may be a course which should be considered as a new Patents Act is now being drafted I do not think for the reasons which I have given that the court is powerless to act in present circumstances, and it would in my judgment, to paraphrase the words of Hall V-C in the Orr case⁸, be a great pity if necessity c was so absolute as to compel me to allow 'this demurrer'.

The employers were obliged to dismiss an employee because of redundancy with effect from 19th September 1970. Since the employee was to take up new employment immediately following his dismissal it was thought that no redundancy payment need be made to him. On 27th March 1971, i.e. more than six months after his dismissal, the employee made application for a redundancy payment from his former employers. The employers made the redundancy payment on 16th April and then claimed a rebate from the Secretary of State for Employment under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, s 30. The industrial tribunal held that the employers were entitled to a rebate from the Secretary of State on the grounds that, j notwithstanding the employee's failure to make his application for redundancy payment within the period of six months required by s 21^a of the 1965 Act, the employers had waived any defence to the employee's claim that they might have taken under that section, and that, consequently, at the time of payment, the employers were 'liable' within the meaning of s 30 (1) (a)^b of the 1965 Act to pay the employee. The Secretary of State appealed. a

Held—The appeal would be allowed, and an order substituted that the employers were not entitled to a rebate under the 1965 Act, for the following reasons— b

(i) s 21 of the 1965 Act was not a procedural provision which barred a remedy but an overriding provision which barred a right; accordingly, since none of the conditions laid down by s 21 of the 1965 Act had been satisfied, the employee had no right to claim a redundancy payment and, therefore, when the payment was made the employers were not 'liable' to make it (see p 990 g to j, post); dictum of Lord Parker CJ in J Smith Coats (London) Ltd v Rifkin (1970) 5 ITR at 189 considered; c

(ii) waiver of a possible defence under s 21 of the 1965 Act could not affect the rights of strangers to the litigation and the liability of the Secretary of State, who held entirely independent rights and obligations as trustee of the Redundancy Fund, must be strictly limited to the terms of the 1965 Act (see p 992 d and h, post). d

Per Curiam. Decisions of the Divisional Court, while of the highest persuasive authority, are not binding on the National Industrial Relations Court (see p 992 e and f, post). e

Appeal

This was an appeal by the Secretary of State for Employment against a decision, given on 11th August 1971, of the industrial tribunal (chairman, Sir John Clayden) sitting in London, that the employers, Atkins Auto Laundries Ltd, were entitled to recover a rebate of £45 under the provisions of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965, s 30. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court. g

Thomas Bingham for the Secretary of State for Employment.

T Scott Baker for the employers. h

SIR JOHN DONALDSON P delivered the judgment of the court. This is an appeal by the Secretary of State for Employment from a decision of the industrial tribunal, sitting in London, which decided that the employers were entitled to a rebate under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965. The claim was made under s 30 (1) (a) of the Act, which is in these terms: i

'Subject to the provisions of this section, the Minister shall make a payment (in this Part of this Act referred to as a "rebate") out of the fund to any employer who—(a) is liable under Part I of this Act to pay, and has paid, a redundancy payment to an employee . . .'

^b Section 30 (1), so far as material, is set out infra

a The fund, it should be said, is a fund to which employers make contributions. This claim, which was disputed by the Secretary of State, was referred to the tribunal under s 34 of the Act, and for present purposes it is only necessary to refer to parts of sub-ss (1) and (2), which provide:

‘(1) Subsections (2) and (3) of this section shall have effect where—(a) a claim is made for a rebate on the grounds that an employer is liable to pay, and has paid, an employer’s payment . . .

b ‘(2) Where any such claim or application is made or such prior notice is given, there shall be referred to a tribunal, in accordance with regulations made under Part III of this Act,—(a) any question as to the liability of the employer to pay the employer’s payment . . .’

c It is clear that the section contemplates that employers may in fact make redundancy payments in circumstances in which they are not liable to make them. It is within the experience of some members of this court that this is done fairly commonly. It is done in circumstances, for example, where it is thought that in the interests of good industrial relations some payment should be made to an employee who does not qualify under the Act, because he has not been in continuous employment by that employer for the full minimum period of two years. Again, circumstances can arise in which an employer considers that the rate of payment provided under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 is in all the circumstances inadequate, and the employer then increases the amount of the payment above that calculated in accordance with the Act. This court does not wish in any way to discourage this practice being adopted by good employers in appropriate circumstances, but it is not itself concerned with payments which are made either in excess of the amount laid down by the Act or in circumstances which do not qualify for a payment under the Act.

e The Secretary of State has no official or personal interest in the state of the Redundancy Fund out of which the rebates are paid. He is the guardian of that fund and is, indeed, a trustee of it. It is, therefore, his duty to ensure that while f all proper rebates are paid out of the fund, no sums are paid out in circumstances which do not qualify for a rebate. It is perfectly clear that in the present case there is a serious question to be decided affecting not only this case, but a number of other cases, and in the circumstances the Secretary of State has come to this court to obtain a ruling as to where his duty lies. He has appreciated that a very small sum was in dispute in this particular case—some £45—and that an employer, faced with a challenge with regard to so small a sum, might well take the view, and might reasonably take the view, that it was cheaper simply to abandon his claim than to resist the appeal.

g The task of a court which has to decide a matter which is not fully argued on both sides is very much more difficult, and in those circumstances the Secretary of State has thought it right—and we are grateful to him for having done so—to agree to pay h the costs of the employers whatever the result of this appeal.

Having said that, let me now state the facts out of which the appeal arises. They are conveniently set out in para 3 of the reasons which the tribunal gave for its decision. That paragraph states:

i ‘The [employers] had a shop in Norwich. At that shop Mr. Kulizs was employed. The [employers] sold the shop, and by reason of that had to dismiss Mr. Kulizs. The dismissal took effect on 19th September, 1970. A redundancy payment was paid to him on 16th April, 1971. The only written claim by the employee for a redundancy payment was made on 27th March 1971. The reason that no redundancy payment was made, in this clear case of entitlement, was because the directors of the [employers] knew that the employee was to be employed by a friend of one director, in Norwich and they were of the view that redundancy payments were only payable when persons were out of employment as a result of dismissal by reason of redundancy. Because this employee was immediately to be employed it was thought that no redundancy payment need be made.' a

Unfortunately, that re-employment did not last, and it was in consequence of it coming to an end that the employee made further enquiries and claimed a redundancy payment. Once the claim came to the notice of the employers, they promptly—and no doubt very reasonably, in all the circumstances—paid the amount which either was due or would have been due had the claim been made at an earlier time. b

The Secretary of State says that on these facts the employers were not liable to pay the redundancy payment at the time at which they in fact paid it, and that accordingly the fund is not liable to make a rebate payment to the employers. That contention turns on two other sections of the Act, namely ss 1 and 21. Section 1, so far as is material, provides: c

'Where on or after the appointed day an employee who has been continuously employed for the requisite period—(a) is dismissed by his employer by reason of redundancy, or (b) . . . then, subject to the following provisions of this Part of this Act, the employer shall be liable to pay to him a sum (in this Act referred to as a "redundancy payment") calculated in accordance with Schedule 1 to this Act . . . ' d

The 'following provisions of this Part of this Act' to which that subsection refers include s 21, which is in these terms:

'Notwithstanding anything in the preceding provisions of this Part of this Act, an employee shall not be entitled to a redundancy payment unless, before the end of the period of six months beginning with the relevant date,—[the relevant date is the date when the dismissal notice took effect] (a) the payment has been agreed and paid, or (b) the employee has made a claim for the payment by notice in writing given to the employer, or (c) a question as to the right of the employee to the payment, or as to the amount of the payment, has been referred to a tribunal in accordance with regulations made under Part III of this Act.' e

The Secretary of State says that none of the three alternative conditions is satisfied on the facts of this case, and in that he is plainly right. He goes on to say that, that being so, there is no liability to make a redundancy payment under s 1, because s 1 is subject to s 21, and s 21 is an overriding provision. f

Counsel for the employers says that that is not correct because s 21 is, as he submits, a procedural provision which bars a remedy but not the right. Accordingly, he says, it is open to the employer to decide whether or not he will rely on this potential defence and, if he does not rely on it, the remedy remains. The right remains in any event. We have considered whether that submission is right, and we have come to the conclusion that it is not. g

The language of s 21 is, as counsel has pointed out on behalf of the Secretary of State, very strongly indicative of a provision intended to bar a right. The words are that 'an employee shall not be entitled to a redundancy payment'—not that he shall not be entitled to claim one. He shall not be entitled to a redundancy payment, notwithstanding anything in the preceding provisions of this part of the Act. By contrast, s 2 (1) of the Limitation Act 1939—the most commonly invoked limitation provision—is in terms that action shall not be brought after specified periods; and s 29 (3) of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954, referred to in *Kammins Ballrooms Co Ltd v Zenith Investments (Torquay) Ltd*¹, is in terms that 'No application under subsection (1) of section twenty-four of this Act shall be entertained'. Those two provisions are clearly procedural, whereas in our judgment s 21 is not. h a But counsel for the employers says that the conclusion which I have indicated is inconsistent with a decision of the Divisional Court in *J Smith Coats (London) Ltd v Rifkin*². He adds that that decision is, in his submission, binding on this court and that if and insofar—which he does not admit—it is wrong, it can only be put right by the Court of Appeal. That case, in our judgment, should be looked at with care. It was a claim by employees against employers. What had happened was that the business of S Rifkin Ltd had been transferred to J Smith Coats (London) Ltd and, as a result of that transfer, a redundancy situation was said to have arisen. There was an issue between the employees and the employers whether there had been sufficient continuity of employment. Written notices were given to both the original employer and the new employer, by or on behalf of the employees, and these notices were given in sufficient time to satisfy the provisions of s 21. The employees then started proceedings before a tribunal against the original employers, S Rifkin Ltd. Those proceedings, as we understand it, failed because it was held that it was not the original employers who were liable, if anybody was liable; it was the new employers, J Smith Coats (London) Ltd. Fresh proceedings were therefore brought against J Smith Coats (London) Ltd and, while it had been proved in the first proceedings that these notices were given to both parties, this was never proved in the second proceedings. Such a situation is common, not only in front of tribunals, but in front of courts, where both parties know that a particular state of facts exists and there is no issue about those facts. Those facts may not be proved and that is what happened in this case. The issue of continuity was investigated by the tribunal and a decision was reached that J Smith Coats (London) Ltd, the second employers, were liable to make a redundancy payment. The employers then appealed to the Divisional Court and put forward the, to us, quite astonishing contention that the tribunal had erred in law because they had allowed the employees' claim to a redundancy payment in the absence of any evidence that a written notice had been given. Technically this was, of course, correct; the employers had received proper notice, and they knew that they had received proper notice. But owing to the fact that it was common ground between the parties, it could be said that there was, strictly speaking, no evidence before the tribunal that the provisions of s 21 had been complied with. It is not surprising that so wholly unmeritorious a submission received short shrift from the Divisional Court, and we do not accept, as was suggested at one stage of the argument, that 'short shrift' is the same thing as 'lack of consideration'. Some points are so bad, that they are not in any way improved by prolonged consideration of them.

e Lord Parker CJ, in the course of his judgment, cited a passage from the reasons of the tribunal in which the tribunal recited that all three applicants, the employees, had applied in writing for redundancy payments both from S Rifkin Ltd and the respondent company, J Smith Coats (London) Ltd. He went on to say that there was no evidence of that, except in the proceedings against S Rifkin Ltd, and that evidence in those proceedings was not evidence against J Smith Coats (London) Ltd. Accordingly the tribunal were quite wrong in finding as a fact as against the appellants that they had received a notice complying with s 21 of the 1965 Act. He continued³:

i 'It is in those circumstances that [counsel for the appellants] urges that the tribunal were wrong in law in finding that the appropriate section 21 notice had been given when there was no evidence in the proceedings against the appellants to support it. For my part I would dismiss this appeal. The appellants never took the point before the tribunal; no reference was ever made before the tribunal to section 21. The passage that I have read is just something which the tribunal stated in reciting what had happened at the earlier proceedings against S. Rifkin Ltd. Section 21 is in the form of a limitation of proceedings clause; it is perfectly open to a party to waive it. These appellants, by never taking the point, in my judgment completely waived it, and I would not allow them and do not allow them to raise the point for the first time in this Court. Accordingly I would dismiss the appeal.'

2 (1970) 5 ITR 188

And Ashworth and Talbot JJ said that they agreed.

Now, the issue which was being considered by the Divisional Court was whether this point could be taken on appeal for the first time. It was not a case where some point had been raised on appeal as to the jurisdiction of the tribunal; it was simply a point which went to the correctness of the decision of the tribunal. The court, furthermore, did not have to consider the effect of the tribunal's decision on the liability of the Redundancy Fund. It is perfectly true that Lord Parker CJ did say that s 21 is in the form of a limitation of proceedings clause. But if he meant thereby that this was a procedural provision barring a remedy, as opposed to a substantive provision barring a right, then in our judgment that expression of view was unnecessary for the decision in the case with which he was concerned. Within the limits of what that case decided, we respectfully agree with it. No employer can be heard to say that a tribunal had erred in law, when he has failed to draw their attention to the particular point of law in respect of which he is making a complaint on appeal. In similar circumstances, we have no doubt that this court would have reached exactly the same conclusion. But such an approach does not, of course, affect the rights of somebody who was a stranger to the litigation concerned.

The Secretary of State has entirely independent rights and obligations. Whether counsel for the employers is right or wrong in submitting that this court is bound by the decisions of the Divisional Court is a matter which may have to be decided in another case. Suffice it for present purposes to say that had it been a matter for decision in this case, we are satisfied that, whilst decisions of the Divisional Court are, of course, of the highest possible persuasive authority, and whilst we shall, of course, welcome being referred to them and shall consider them with the greatest possible respect, we do not, as at present advised, consider that we are bound by such decisions. It is otherwise, of course, with regard to decisions of the Court of Session and the Court of Appeal, those being courts to which appeal lies on matters of law from decisions of this court.

In those circumstances, it really suffices if we say that in our judgment the Secretary of State is right when he says that the employer seeking a rebate under s 30 (1) (a) has to prove that he was liable under the Act to pay at the time at which he paid.

We should not like to part from this case without stressing once again that nothing in this decision should be taken as discouraging employers from making payment to employees in redundancy situations, if they consider it appropriate in all the circumstances, without regard to whether or not they are, strictly speaking, redundancy payments in accordance with the terms of the Act. On the other hand, the Secretary of State's liability as trustee of the fund must be limited strictly to the terms of the Act. The appeal will be allowed, and we substitute an order that the employers are not entitled to a rebate under the Act.

Appeal allowed.

c Customs – Importation of prohibited goods – Indecent or obscene prints, paintings, photographs, books, cards, lithographic or other engravings, or any other indecent or obscene articles – Photographs – Cinematograph film – Whether cinematograph film ‘photographs’ – Customs Consolidation Act 1876, s 42.

d The Commissioners of Customs and Excise seized 16 reels of 35 mm cinematograph film, imported by the appellant, as being liable to forfeiture under s 42^a of the Customs Consolidation Act 1876 which prohibited the importation of ‘Indecent or obscene prints, paintings, photographs, books, cards, lithographic or other engravings, or any other indecent or obscene articles’. The films were obscene or indecent. They were in transparency form and because they were small required mechanical apparatus to project them on to a screen before they could be visually enjoyed and inspected. On the question whether the film came within the prohibition in s 42, e Held – The film came within the prohibition, and forfeiture of them was therefore justified, for the following reasons—

(i) the argument that the film was not capable of being indecent or obscene because it was not translated into a form which could give offence should not be accepted (see p 995 h and p 996 f and j, post); Straker v Director of Public Prosecutions [1963] 1 All ER 697 considered;

f (ii) the ejusdem generis rule did not apply to the concluding words of the prohibition, ‘or any other indecent or obscene articles’, so as to exclude from those words cinematograph films, for the items described in the prohibition did not form the single genus alleged, i.e. items which could be immediately realised as being indecent on mere visual inspection, since the alleged genus was not appropriate to the item ‘books’ in the prohibition; it followed that the prohibition applied to any articles, including cinematograph films, which were indecent or obscene (see p 995 j to p 996 a c f and j, post);

g (iii) alternatively, the films were ‘photographs’ within the prohibition despite the fact that mechanical apparatus was required to use them (see p 996 b c f and j, post).

h Per Lord Widgery CJ. The fact that cinematograph films are subject to other controls has no bearing on the interpretation of s 42 of the 1876 Act. Section 42 is an important means of preventing indecent films reaching the United Kingdom, and the other statutory restrictions which prevent their use once they are in the country are merely complementary to s 42 (see p 996 d, post).

Case stated

This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the county of East Sussex in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Lewes on 17th February 1971.

The respondents, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, preferred a complaint against the appellant, William Sydney Derrick, that on 17th August 1970 at Newhaven Car Hall, Sussex, he imported 16 reels of 35 mm cinematograph film ('the films') which were liable to forfeiture on the grounds that they were indecent or obscene articles imported contrary to the prohibition contained in s 42 of the Customs Consolidation Act 1876, and further that, if any of the articles was in itself not indecent or obscene, it was mixed, packed or found with an indecent or obscene article liable to forfeiture under the Customs Acts the films having been seized on that date as liable to forfeiture under ss 44 and 277 of the Customs and Excise Act 1952.

It was contended by the appellant that—(a) the films were neither indecent nor obscene; (b) cinematographic films did not fall within the phrase 'any other indecent or obscene articles' contained in the expression 'Indecent or obscene prints, paintings, photographs, books, cards, lithographic or other engravings, or any other indecent or obscene articles' in s 42 of the Customs Consolidation Act 1876. It was conceded by the appellant that if any of the films fell within the prohibition then all the films were liable to forfeiture as being found with goods liable to forfeiture by reason of s 277 (1) (b) of the Customs and Excise Act 1952.

It was contended on behalf of the commissioners that (a) the films were both indecent and obscene; (b) cinematographic films fell within the phrase 'any other indecent or obscene articles' in s 42; if they were not 'articles' they were photographs.

The justices found that the films were indecent and obscene articles; and were of the opinion that at the time of seizure, the films were liable to forfeiture. The justices condemned them as forfeited. The question for the opinion of the High Court was whether cinematographic films could fall within 'Indecent or obscene prints, paintings, photographs, books, cards, lithographic or other engravings, or any other indecent or obscene articles' in s 42 of the Customs Consolidation Act 1876.

B T Wigoder QC and W S E Getz for the appellant.

Gordon Slynn for the commissioners.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated from justices for the county of East Sussex sitting at Lewes who, on 17th February 1971, made a forfeiture order, as I can conveniently describe it, in respect of 16 reels of 35 mm cinematograph film which had been imported at Newhaven and which were alleged by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise to be indecent or obscene articles.

The authority for seizure of such an article in the case as made out is the Customs Consolidation Act 1876 which in s 42 provides that:

'The goods enumerated and described in the following table of prohibitions and restrictions inwards are hereby prohibited to be imported or brought into the United Kingdom, save as thereby excepted, and if any goods so enumerated and described shall be imported or brought into the United Kingdom contrary to the prohibitions or restrictions contained therein, such goods shall be forfeited, and may be destroyed or otherwise disposed of as the Commissioners of Customs may direct¹.'

¹ The words in italics were repealed by the Customs and Excise Act 1952, s 320 and Sch 12, Part I. The provision for forfeiture of goods improperly imported is now contained in s 44 of the 1952 Act

a 'Indecent or obscene prints, paintings, photographs, books, cards, lithographic or other engravings, or any other indecent or obscene articles.'

There was no issue before the justices as to the obscene or indecent character of the articles in question, and the only issue before us is whether 35 mm cinematograph film in reels comes within the prohibition which I have just read and comes within the terms of the charge in this case which alleged that they were indecent or obscene articles within the prohibition.

b Counsel who has argued the matter for the appellant invites us to apply the ejusdem generis doctrine to the construction of the prohibition. He says that there is to be found in these words of description a single genus and he points out in his submission that all the items specifically described are items of which on visual inspection it is possible to form an immediate judgment as to their indecent quality. He says that c cinematograph films are not within that genus because before their character in regard to decency or indecency can be judged, they have to be displayed with apparatus in some way and a picture thrown on a screen. Accordingly, when one comes to the concluding words of the prohibition, and I quote them again 'or any other indecent or obscene articles', he asks us to apply the ejusdem generis doctrine and to exclude from those final words films of the description here in question.

d His second argument, which is alternative to the first, is that a reel of 35 mm film is not capable of being indecent or obscene, and in support of that he relies on a decision in this court in *Straker v Director of Public Prosecutions*². That was a rather special case under the Obscene Publications Act 1959. The articles which had been seized from the defendant comprised a very large number of photographic negatives which were described by the court in the course of judgment as the 'stock-in-trade' e of the accused. The real question in Straker's case² was whether these negatives had been published within the meaning of the charge, but there is an observation of Lord Parker CJ³ which is rather closer to the circumstances of the present case. There, having read s 1 (2) of the Obscene Publications Act 1959, which is in these terms:

f '... any description of article containing or embodying matter to be read or looked at or both, any sound record, and any film or other record of a picture or pictures',

Lord Parker CJ went on to say:

g 'Pausing there, for my part it seems to me that it is possible, without deciding the matter finally, for a negative such as we are dealing with here to come within the words "any film or other record of a picture".'

The matter did not require further investigation in that case and for my part I would have had little doubt in construing the 1959 Act that a negative was a film or other record of a picture within the meaning of the phrase. I see no reason to distinguish between the positive and the negative for the purposes of that Act, and h accordingly, as it seems to me, the argument that this film is not capable of being indecent or obscene because it is not translated into a form in which it can give offence is not an argument which I find attractive in this case.

i Counsel for the commissioners seeks to meet the first argument in two ways. He submits in the first place that there is no single genus in the prohibition in the 1876 Act. He points out that the genus alleged by counsel for the appellant is not appropriate at any rate to books. He submits that it may well be impossible in the case of a novel to decide whether it is decent or indecent from a short and brief survey of its pages. Accordingly he says that even if the other matters in the prohibition may disclose a common genus, there is an exception at all events in the case of books and thus, he says, the argument that ejusdem generis can be applied is self-rebutted. His contention, which he says is consistent with the understanding of this Act for many years, is that ejusdem generis should not be applied and that the prohibition therefore applies to any articles which are indecent or obscene. If that is the right view, of course, it justifies the forfeiture order made in the present case. a

Alternatively, although I think a little less enthusiastically, counsel for the commissioners would contend that cinematograph film is a 'photograph' within the precise words of the prohibition—a photograph not the less because it consisted of a series of photographs, not the less because the photographs were in transparency form, not the less because the photographs were small and required some kind of mechanical enlargement in order that they might be enjoyed. b

For my part I am prepared to accept that either of those arguments is sufficient for present purposes. I agree that the ejusdem generis rule cannot apply. It follows that any article which is indecent may be forfeited under this procedure, and had it been necessary, I would certainly have been prepared to hold that these films are photographs despite the limitations on their use to which I have already referred. c

The fact that cinematograph films are subject to other controls, as indeed they are, seems to me to be beside the point. The present section is a very important means of preventing indecent films from ever reaching the country at all, and the other statutory restrictions which prevent their use once they are in the country are, I think, merely complementary. Nor am I impressed by the fact that in a somewhat parallel provision in the Post Office Act 1953⁴, Parliament has thought it desirable with the production of the cinematograph film for the first time to refer to it in terms in prohibitions of this kind under the post office legislation. d

These points are of some persuasive power, but, in my judgment, they do not meet counsel for the commissioners' argument and I would dismiss this appeal. e

ASHWORTH J. I agree. I would only add that I entirely agree with Lord Widgery CJ that this is not a case in which the ejusdem generis rule of construction can be applied. As counsel for the commissioners put it, the object of this particular paragraph in the table of prohibitions is manifestly to prevent the importation of indecent things. Whatever their shape or form, the object is to prevent indecency being distributed in this country. He illustrated that by suggesting that it would be absurd if while this list of named articles was effective so far as it went, nonetheless an importer so minded could introduce without fear of trouble toys or statues which could quite obviously be indecent. f

Moreover, it seems to me a complete answer to counsel for the appellant's contentions for one has only got to study the facts in regard to books to realise that this is not limited to indecent objects which can be recognised as being indecent on mere inspection, otherwise one can imagine the country being flooded with paperbacks perfectly innocent on their outside but containing all manner of indecency within. This would mean, I think, putting a very limited and far too strict construction on the prohibition which was intended as already mentioned to prohibit the distribution of indecency within this country. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed. g h

GRIFFITHS J. I agree.

COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

22nd, 23rd, 24th NOVEMBER, 2nd DECEMBER 1971

b Contempt of court – Committal – Breach of injunction – County court – Jurisdiction – Injunction spent at date of order – Effect of committal punishment only – Landlord harassing tenants to procure their departure – Injunction prohibiting harassment – Landlord continuing to harass tenants in spite of injunction – Tenants all departing in consequence – Subsequent application for attachment – Power of county court to commit for contempt even though injunction no longer effective – County Courts Act 1959, s 74.

The landlord of a house let in single-roomed flats gave the tenants notice to quit and a notice purporting to increase their rents by about 100 per cent. The tenants referred the agreements to the rent tribunal, asking it to fix the rents and to defer the operation of the notices to quit. Thereafter the landlord embarked on a policy of persecuting and terrorising the tenants with the object of driving them from their

d homes. Eight of the tenants brought actions against the landlord in the county court claiming damages for breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment and injunctions to restrain him from 'evicting or attempting to evict [them] . . . or from interfering with [their] reasonable enjoyment of' the premises, and the county court granted interim injunctions in the terms sought. The copies of the orders served on the landlord were endorsed with a notice as follows: "Take Notice that unless you obey

e the directions contained in this Order you will be guilty of Contempt of Court and will be liable to be committed to prison." The landlord completely ignored the orders and, as found by the trial judge, 'resorted to every means possible, short of physical force, in order to get [the tenants] out of the house . . . the principal elements were a mixture of causing intolerable inconvenience against a background of fear of what was going to happen next . . .'. As a result all the tenants left, and it was indicated

f at the hearing that they would not return. An application was made for an order of attachment committing the landlord to prison for having disobeyed the order on the grant of interim injunctions and at the hearing of the actions and the application together the county court judge awarded the tenants damages and ordered the landlord to be committed to prison for contempt. On appeal by the landlord it was contended that, whilst under s 74^a of the County Courts Act 1959 a county court judge

g had jurisdiction to commit to prison for breach of an injunction which he had granted provided that it was still effectively in existence, he had no jurisdiction to do so in circumstances where the injunction could no longer be of any effect, for the committal would not then be a deterrent against further breaches of the injunction but would merely be a punishment; accordingly, since the tenants had all left the house, the injunction was no longer of any effect and so the county court judge had no jurisdiction h to commit the landlord for contempt.

Held – The High Court had jurisdiction to commit for contempt for breach of an injunction even though the injunction had ceased to have effect; it followed that, by virtue of s 74 of the 1959 Act, the county court had the same power since otherwise the injunction granted would not have afforded the tenants 'as full and ample' a j remedy 'as ought to be granted or given in the like case by the High Court'; the fact that the landlord was liable to committal was an essential part of the remedy granted and it would not have been 'full and ample' unless the order for committal could be made in the county court (see p 1003 c and f to p 1004 c, p 1009 g and h and p 1010 b and c, post).

Appeal

The defendant, Susan Margaret Baker, appealed against (i) an order of his Honour Judge Curtis-Raleigh made in Bloomsbury and Marylebone County Court on 20th October 1971 in respect of an application by the plaintiff, Renee Jennison, for an order of attachment against the defendant, whereunder the judge ordered that the defendant be committed to prison for contempt of court by reason of her disobedience to an interlocutory order made against her on 30th June 1971; that order restrained her from evicting or attempting to evict the plaintiff without due process of law from the premises occupied by the plaintiff at 105 Sutherland Avenue, London W9, or from interfering with the plaintiff's reasonable enjoyment of those premises; and (ii) an order of his Honour Judge Leslie made on 29th October 1971 dismissing the defendant's application for immediate discharge from custody, but directing that the defendant be so discharged on 12th November 1971. The grounds of appeal were as follows: (1) The plaintiff's application for an order of attachment was made after the plaintiff had abandoned the benefit of her interlocutory injunction by quitting the premises with the permanent intention not to return there under any conditions. f

(2) The attachment procedure laid down in CCR Ord 25, rr 67-70, did not empower the court to impose punishment in respect of past disobedience to an injunction granted by the court once the necessity to secure further compliance with the court's order had ceased to exist. g

(3) The injunction, for disobedience to which the defendant had been ordered to be committed to prison, had ceased to be effective by the election of the plaintiff and the defendant's prior disobedience to that injunction had accordingly been waived. h

(4) His Honour Judge Curtis-Raleigh exceeded his jurisdiction in ordering that the defendant be committed to prison. i

(5) Alternatively, the judge acted on a wrong principle of law and misdirected himself as to the nature of the court's powers of attachment in ordering that the defendant be committed to prison.

(6) Alternatively, the judge, having made an award of punitive damages in favour of the plaintiff, ought not in addition to have committed the defendant to prison.

- e (7) His Honour Judge Leslie ought to have ordered the immediate release of the defendant from custody in all the circumstances of the case. (8) Insofar as the defendant's contempt of court was capable of being purged the defendant had purged her contempt. The facts are set out in the judgment of Salmon LJ.

2nd December. The following judgments were read.

- SALMON LJ. This case raises a point of great general importance, namely, whether the county court judges have adequate authority and power to grant an effective remedy by way of injunction. It has always been generally supposed that they have such authority and power. So far at any rate there has certainly been no decision to the contrary. Before considering this question I must state the relevant facts.

- c 105 Sutherland Avenue, Paddington, is a house divided into single-roomed flats each with its own kitchen. There were adequate bathroom and lavatory facilities shared by the tenants of the flats, who also enjoyed the use of the garden. For many years prior to June 1971 the leasehold had been owed by a Mrs Irene Pearce. She maintained the friendliest relationship with the tenants, most of whom had been living in the house for a long time, two of them for as long as 20 years. The tenants were mostly middle-aged or elderly persons who behaved impeccably and paid their rent punctually. The learned county court judge found that they were 'mild, unaggressive . . . and . . . truthful'. Most of them are the plaintiffs in the actions with which the present appeal is concerned. On 11th June 1971 Mrs Pearce sold her leasehold interest to the defendant. From that moment the peace and happiness which the tenants had formerly enjoyed vanished. It is clear from the findings of the learned judge that the defendant immediately embarked on a policy of persecuting and terrorising her tenants with the object of driving them from their homes. The persecution increased in intensity until it finally succeeded in achieving its object. By 17th July all the tenants had departed and left the defendant triumphant, and in vacant possession of the house.

- e It is necessary that I should give a brief resumé of how the defendant accomplished her objective. On 14th June she served each of the tenants with a month's notice to quit and a notice purporting to increase their rents by about 100 per cent. The tenants immediately went to the rent tribunal asking it to fix the rents and to defer the operation of the notices to quit. On 17th June the tribunal notified the defendant that the matter had been referred and that the effect of the notices to quit was therefore postponed until after the tribunal had announced its decision. By 30th June the persecution to which I have referred had become so unbearable that eight of the tenants each started proceedings in the county court against the defendant, claiming damages for breach of the covenant of quiet enjoyment and an injunction to restrain the defendant—

'from evicting or attempting to evict the Plaintiff without due process of law [from 105 Sutherland Avenue] or from interfering with the Plaintiff's reasonable enjoyment of [these premises].'

On the same day as the tenants started proceedings the county court judge granted interim injunctions in the terms of the injunctions claimed in the actions. On the same day also, copies of the orders were served on the defendant. On the back of each copy, in accordance with the ordinary practice, the following notice appeared:

'Take Notice that unless you obey the directions contained in this Order you will be guilty of Contempt of Court and will be liable to be committed to prison.'

The defendant completely ignored this notice. Its only apparent effect was to induce her to intensify her effort to evict the tenants. To quote the learned county court judge: a

‘... she resorted to every means possible, short of physical force, in order to get them out of the house. The methods were varied; in some cases subtle, in some cases crude, but the principal elements were a mixture of causing intolerable inconvenience against a background of fear of what was going to happen next, with the suggestion always in the background that more direct physical methods could not be excluded.’ b

The defendant introduced a man called George into the house whose very appearance frightened the tenants, and according to the learned county court judge’s findings, Mr George was installed by the defendant in order to terrorise the tenants. He certainly succeeded in doing so. He was given a room in the basement for which he paid no rent and he appeared to perform no function save that of causing the maximum inconvenience to the tenants. For example, the water was turned off by Mr George many times between 13th and 19th June and again on 9th July (nine days after the granting of the interim injunction) so that the tenants could not wash or even make tea in the house. When the tenants found out the whereabouts of the stop-cock and turned the water on, it was immediately turned off again by Mr George. c
Finally, on 9th July Mr George boarded up the access to the stop-cock. However, after the police and the water board officials had been called in, the boarding appears to have been removed but the water was still frequently turned off after 9th July for no good reason. d

Again, Mr George, on the defendant’s orders, distorted the lock on the front door so that the tenants could not open it with their keys. This meant that they could not get into the house but only out of it through the front door. Then the front door was nailed up from the inside so that the tenants could not even get out of the house by that means. Their only way of getting into or out of the house was through the door in the basement to which none of them had a key. It was always kept open after 11th June; and this alarmed them. It also alarmed them that in using that door they had to pass Mr George’s room. Another man was introduced into the house by the defendant under the guise of a painter. His chief qualification seems to have been that he had until very recently been a professional all-in wrestler—and looked it. Again his chief function was to annoy and frighten the tenants. He purposely made a great deal of mess, splashing paint in all directions and he brought a great deal of rubbish into the house, most of which was put into the bathroom. This effectively prevented its use by the tenants. Then he introduced 26 rusty e bedsteads which, with the help of Mr George, were piled up in such a position that it left a space of only about six inches through which the tenants had to squeeze in order to reach the only door by which they could get out of the house. They felt that they were being barricaded. f

Disgusting and alarming slogans were painted on the walls, strongly suggesting to the tenants that they must get out. The tenants’ rooms were entered with a pass-key and furniture left disturbed and windows opened so that the tenants should know that their privacy had been invaded. On one occasion an apparently sound but broken chair was substituted for a good one. When the tenant stood on it to shut the window which the intruder had left open, the chair collapsed and the tenant suffered quite a nasty injury. One of the tenants had kept a cat to which she was much attached for 3½ years. No one had ever complained. The defendant told her to get rid of it and in the most menacing tones suggested that unless she did so, she, the defendant, would attend to it herself. The tenant had her cat painlessly destroyed lest it should suffer a worse fate at the defendant’s hands. She told the defendant what she had done in case the defendant killed some other cat by mistake. g

Finally, on 14th July some of the tenants discussed what they should do about the back door. It was then about midnight and as usual the door had been left unlocked. h

a They decided to bolt it, having first taken all reasonable steps to make sure that Mr George was in his bedroom asleep. Apparently, however, he was out, for soon afterwards there was a loud hammering on the door. Obviously at least two men were kicking and banging the door very hard and at the same time using disgusting and threatening language. The tenants were terrified. Eventually Mr George and another powerfully built man kicked in the door, and ran upstairs screaming insults at the top of their voices. They then shook their fists in the tenants' faces shouting 'Come on we want you out' and 'You'll all have to get out'. The tenants were in a state of terror. They drank a little brandy to steady their nerves and locked themselves in their rooms until morning. And in the morning all but one of them left. Two days later the last remaining tenant's nerve failed and she left also.

b What occurred at 105 Sutherland Avenue was by no means unique. In two other houses close by with which the defendant was intimately associated, either as the landlord or manageress for her husband, a similar policy of persecution and terrorism was adopted for the purpose of evicting the tenants. Indeed, the same props were used—Mr George, the all-in wrestler, and even the rusty bedsteads. The policy was equally successful and those houses were emptied. This evidence was properly allowed by the learned county court judge as relevant to counter the suggested defence that what was being done at 105 Sutherland Avenue was not done with the knowledge or authority of the defendant nor with the intention of evicting her tenants.

c On 9th August an application was made for an order of attachment committing the defendant to prison for having disobeyed the county court order of 30th June. This application was supported by a number of affidavits. I have outlined the salient facts to which they deposed. The application came on for hearing on 13th August before his Honour Judge Curtis-Raleigh. The defendant asked for an adjournment for the purpose of answering these affidavits. The learned county court judge granted the adjournment and, no doubt in order to give the defendant plenty of time to prepare her evidence and to save the parties the costs of two hearings, ordered that the application should be heard at the same time as the trial of the action. The hearing commenced on 20th September and occupied six days between that date and 20th October when judgment was given. The learned county court judge found that the facts to which the plaintiffs had deposed had been proved. Accordingly, he gave judgment for the plaintiffs awarding them damages, and he also ordered that the defendant should be committed to prison for contempt.

f On 29th October his Honour Judge Leslie dismissed the defendant's application for an immediate discharge from custody but directed that she should be discharged from custody on 12th November. The defendant now appeals from the orders of his Honour Judge Curtis-Raleigh and his Honour Judge Leslie on the ground that, in the circumstances, his Honour Judge Curtis-Raleigh had no jurisdiction to make an order of attachment committing her to prison and that, accordingly, his Honour Judge Leslie should have immediately discharged her from custody.

g The question for this court is whether his Honour Judge Curtis-Raleigh had jurisdiction to make the order of attachment which he made on 20th October. The inherent power of the judges of the High Court to commit for contempt of court has existed from time immemorial. 'Contempt of court' is an unfortunate and misleading phrase. It suggests that it exists to protect the dignity of the judges. Nothing could be further from the truth. The power exists to ensure that justice shall be done. And solely to this end it prohibits acts and words tending to obstruct the administration of justice. The public at large, no less than the individual litigant, have an interest, and a very real interest, in justice being effectively administered. Unless it is so administered, the rights, and indeed the liberty, of the individual will perish. Contempt of court may take many forms. It may consist of what is somewhat archaically called contempt in the face of the court, e.g. by disrupting the proceedings of a court in session or by improperly refusing to answer questions when giving evidence. It may, in a criminal case, consist of prejudicing a fair trial by publishing material likely to influence a jury. It may, as in the present case, consist of refusing to obey an order of the court. These are only a few of the many examples that could be given of contempt. Contempts have sometimes been classified as criminal and civil contempts. I think that, at any rate today, this is an unhelpful and almost meaningless classification. a

The judges of the Supreme Court undoubtedly have an inherent power to deal with any kind of contempt. The judges of the county court, on the other hand, have only such powers as are conferred on them by statute. There can be no question but that a county court judge has, for example, no power to deal with a contempt of court consisting of an attack out of court on his integrity, nor with contempt committed by a person who has acted as a solicitor in the county court without being qualified. In cases such as these, the contempt may be dealt with in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice: see RSC Ord 52, r 1 (2) (a) (iii); *R v Lefroy*¹; *R v Brompton County Court Judge*². It should be noted that such contempts have nothing to do with the disobedience of orders made by the county court judge himself. b

We have to decide whether the learned county court judge had jurisdiction to commit the defendant to prison for the serious contempt of court of which he found her to be guilty in flagrantly defying an order which he had made. This question depends on the true construction of s 74 of the County Courts Act 1959, which, insofar as it is material, provides: c

'Every county court, as regards any cause of action for the time being within its jurisdiction, shall in any proceedings before it—(a) grant such relief, redress or remedy . . . as ought to be granted or given in the like case by the High Court and in as full and ample a manner.' d

We have very properly had our attention drawn to a number of county court rules and orders, but I am not proposing to refer to them because they deal only with practice and procedure. They cannot confer jurisdiction if none exists under the statute. e

Counsel for the defendant in the course of his powerful argument conceded that, if this had been a High Court action, the High Court judge would have had power to commit, and indeed that, in this very case, the Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division could have committed the defendant if an application had been made to that court. He also conceded that, if the defendant had stopped short at attempting to evict the plaintiffs in defiance of the injunction, the county court judge would have had power to commit her for contempt. He argues however that, as the defendant's attempts succeeded in effecting an eviction and so well that the plaintiffs can no longer bear the thought of returning to 105 Sutherland Avenue, the county court judge had no power to commit her for her contempt. Counsel contends that a county court judge has jurisdiction to commit to prison (which ex hypothesi is a punishment) for a breach of an injunction which he has granted, providing that it is still effectively in existence but not otherwise. This is because, although in the first case the committal would be a punishment, it would still be a deterrent to protect the plaintiff from further breaches of the injunction, whereas in the second case it would be only a punishment. Although the argument has been brilliantly developed and support for it most ingeniously conjured from Blackstone's Commentaries and Wilmut CJ's celebrated undelivered judgment in *R v Almon*³, it really comes to this—that if the defendant had behaved a little less outrageously, so that she had failed to f a evict the tenants, the learned county court judge would have had jurisdiction to commit her but that, because she behaved as outrageously as she did, the county court judge is deprived of jurisdiction. Accordingly, unless (which is most unlikely) the plaintiffs were prepared to go to the considerable extra expense of applying to the High Court for a committal which could bring them no material benefit, the defendant would escape triumphantly from the consequences of her defiance of the county court order. If this is the correct view of the law, it follows that the law can be flouted and brought into disrepute by the defendant with impunity. Moreover, the granting of an interim injunction in the county court would, in many cases, be completely ineffectual as a remedy for the plaintiff.

b For my part, I refuse to give the Act a meaning which leads to such an impractical, unfortunate and ridiculous result unless compelled to do so by the language of the Act itself or by clear authority which is binding on this court. I can find nothing in the Act which supports the argument on behalf of the defendant. The old authorities all date from a time when the county court, as it has existed since the early part of the nineteenth century, had not even been thought of. The only authority which seems to me to be at all in point is *Martin v Bannister*⁴; and this authority, in my view, by no means supports the defendant's contention but tends strongly to negate it. I recognise that in *Martin v Bannister*⁴ an order for attachment in respect of a breach of an injunction was being sought in the county court when the injunction itself was still in force and capable of being obeyed. Accordingly, the courts in that case were not called on to consider what would have been the position in a case such as the present. The question was simply had the county court any jurisdiction to commit a defendant to prison for breach of an injunction which the county court had granted. They unhesitatingly answered that question in the affirmative. The question turned on the true construction of s 89 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, which was in much the same terms as s 74 of the County Courts Act 1959. Bramwell LJ stated⁵:

f 'As to attachment, it is only necessary to shew that an injunction may be granted, to prove that an attachment may also be granted. It is said an attachment is not part of the remedy given by the Court, but a punishment inflicted for disobedience to an injunction, but that is not really so; it is part of the remedy, which consists of an injunction and consequent attachment. The remedy is, in fact, an injunction enforceable by attachment.'

g In the present case the remedy granted to each of the plaintiffs was an injunction against the defendant, enforceable by attachment, not to evict or attempt to evict the plaintiff. In my view, it follows from Bramwell LJ's judgment⁵ that, as the defendant did evict the plaintiffs, the county court had jurisdiction to attach the defendant. It cannot, in my view, assist the defendant or deprive the court of jurisdiction that she used such unpleasant methods in effecting the eviction that the plaintiffs have lost all desire to return.

h Clearly a bare order not to evict would not have afforded the plaintiffs a 'full and ample' remedy. The fact that the defendant was liable to be attached for its breach was an essential part of the remedy granted. Nor in my view would the remedy have been 'full and ample' unless the order for attachment could be made in the county court in which the injunction had been granted. I say this for two reasons: (1) It would be absurdly inconvenient and expensive for a plaintiff if he had to claim damages for the eviction in the county court and apply for an order of attachment in the Queen's Bench Division. (2) A defendant served with a copy of such an injunction would be encouraged to ignore the notice endorsed on its back to the effect that unless he obeyed it he would be liable to be committed to prison if he knew, as he would, that it was most unlikely that the plaintiff would go to the expense of taking him to the Queen's Bench Division—the only court which would have power (if the defendant's contention is right) of sending him to prison for evicting the plaintiff in defiance of the injunction. a

The defendant's liability to punishment by the county court for breach of the injunctions is, therefore, an essential part of the remedy granted to the plaintiffs by the county court. Were it otherwise the 'remedy' would be virtually worthless. It is the deterrent effect of an injunction plus the liability to imprisonment for its breach which is the remedy. It is the remedy as a whole which normally deters the defendant from evicting the plaintiffs. If the effect of serving the order for an interim injunction were that the defendant could not be imprisoned by the county court judge for evicting the plaintiffs, the order would lose its deterrent effect and cease to be a 'full and ample' or indeed any remedy. In my judgment there is nothing in *Seaward v Paterson*⁶ (properly understood) which is inimical to this view. Counsel for the defendant relies on a passage from the judgment in that case of Lindley LJ where he said⁷: b

'... the party who is bound by the injunction is proceeded against [for contempt] for the purpose of enforcing the order of the Court for the benefit of the person who got it.' c

In that case the injunction took the form of an order for the benefit of the plaintiff not to allow certain premises to be used for boxing coupled with a notice that if the defendant disobeyed the injunction it could be enforced by sending him to prison. He did break the injunction and it was so enforced. None of the judges in this court nor in the court below suggested that this was merely to deter the defendant from committing further breaches. d

Of course an injunction is granted and enforced for the protection of the plaintiff. The defendant who breaches it is sent to prison for contempt with the object of vindicating (a) the rights of plaintiffs (especially the plaintiff in the action) and (b) the authority of the court. The two objects are, in my view, inextricably intermixed. Rigby LJ in Seaward's case⁸ pointed out that the court might well send the defendant to prison even if the plaintiff, having applied for attachment, relented and asked that the order in his favour should not be so enforced. The plaintiff cannot waive the order, but, as a rule, the court will pay attention to his wishes. A stranger who helps the defendant to breach the injunction is sent to prison, no doubt as a punishment for contempt but the effect of sending him to prison is also an indirect enforcement of the order which benefits the plaintiff. Whether this particular attribute of an injunction can be regarded as part of the remedy which it affords a plaintiff does not arise for decision in the present case. Nor did it in Seaward's case⁶. e

Let us suppose that an elderly spinster plaintiff had a cat to which she was so attached that, to her, its value was beyond price. The defendant who hated the plaintiff and her cat injured the cat and threatened to kill it. The plaintiff brought an action in the county court claiming damages and an injunction to restrain the defendant from killing or injuring the cat. The plaintiff applied for, and was granted, an interim injunction. In granting that injunction, the county court judge said to the defendant 'I am ordering you not to kill or injure the plaintiff's cat. Remember, if you disobey this order I shall enforce it against you by sending you to prison'. Without the built-in sanction the order would be useless as a remedy. With it, however, in 99 cases out of 100, the order would afford the plaintiff a 'full and ample' remedy. Nevertheless, the particular defendant in the case I have supposed, in f

- a contumacious disregard of the order, brutally kills the cat before the plaintiff's eyes. The plaintiff then applies for an order of attachment. The judge says to the defendant 'I warned you that I should enforce my order by sending you to prison if you disregarded it. I now commit you to prison'. Could the defendant plausibly reply 'Look at what Lindley LJ said in 1897⁹. You have no power to enforce the order in this way, unless you can first bring the cat back to life; and this is impossible'?
- b I think that Lindley LJ would have been very surprised and perturbed had it been suggested to him that what he said in Seaward's case⁹ could be successfully used in support of such an argument.

When *Martin v Bannister*¹⁰ was in the Queen's Bench Division, Pollock B (whose judgment Bramwell LJ¹¹ expressly approved) said¹²:

- c 'It was contended that the language of this section [i e s 89 of the 1873 Act] was not so strong or comprehensive as the language of the Act of 1865, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 99, s. 1, sub-s. 8, which gave the county court "all the power and authority of the High Court of Chancery" in cases of which the present is not one; but though the language differs, it does not differ so much as to lead me to think that a different result was intended by the legislature; and the Act of 1865 shews that there was no jealousy in granting to county courts a power of attachment.'

- d It is worth noting that s 2 of the 1865 Act enacted that:

'In all such Suits or Matters the Judge of a County Court shall, in addition to the Powers and Authorities now possessed by him, have all the Powers and Authorities, for the Purposes of this Act, of a Judge of the High Court of Chancery

- e If the language of s 89 of the 1873 Act and its successor, s 74 of the 1959 Act, as Pollock B suggests, and I respectfully agree, confers the same sort of power and authority on the county court judges as did the 1865 Act, it seems to follow that, so far as orders made by county court judges are concerned, the county court judges have the same power and authority to commit for their breach as a High Court judge would have in respect of the breach of any order made by him. It has often been said that the power to commit must be used sparingly and with the greatest caution. I respectfully agree. There is no reason to suppose, however, that county court judges would be any less conscious of this principle than are judges of the High Court.
- f For these reasons I would hold that the learned county court judge had jurisdiction to make the order of attachment which he made on 20th October committing the defendant to prison.

- EDMUND DAVIES LJ. If ever a case gave rise to what may be described as a cold question of law, totally devoid of all merits, this is that case. The narrative of events related by Salmon LJ fortunately relieves me of the necessity of describing in any detail the odious behaviour of the defendant. It is sufficient to state that, in answer to a question put to him at an early stage during the hearing of the appeal, counsel for the defendant accepted (a) that in deliberate defiance of the interim injunction granted against her by his Honour Judge Curtis-Raleigh on 30th June, the defendant used every means she could think of to drive all tenants out of 105 Sutherland Avenue, and (b) that by those means she succeeded in gaining vacant possession of the entire house by 17th July. And not until after her committal for contempt did the defendant utter one word of regret to the plaintiffs or apology to the court.
- j A more gross contempt is not easily conjured up. If the orders of the court can deliberately be set at nought by a litigant employing for her own personal advantage such means as were here resorted to, and if indeed it be the case that she has to go unpunished for her contumacy, justice vanishes over the horizon and the law is brought into disrepute. Yet such was the broad submission made by counsel for the defendant at an early stage of what was to develop into as splendid an address as I have listened to for many years. Indeed, at that stage he went so far as to submit that by 20th September 1971, when the county court trial was opened, even the High Court would have been powerless to commit the defendant for her undoubted defiance of the interim injunction, because the supervening events had produced such a situation that committal was unnecessary for the due administration of justice. But counsel had second (and, I think, wiser) thoughts about this, and he later conceded that, whether the proceedings were instituted in the High Court or (as here) in the county court, the Divisional Court would have power in such circumstances as the present to commit the defendant for her undoubted contempt of an order made by either court.

The one question that now arises is whether the county court judge was empowered to commit the defendant, so that, in the memorable words of his Honour Judge Curtis-Raleigh:

'The law should not be seen to sit by limply, while those who defy it go free, and those who seek its protection lose hope.'

It is common ground that the answer to that question must be sought and found in the provisions of the County Courts Act 1959, and the rules made thereunder. That this is so emerges clearly from *R v Lefroy*¹³, decided under the statute 9 & 10 Vict, c 95¹⁴, which established county courts and made them courts of record. Section 113 empowered judges of the new courts to impose a fine not exceeding £5 or to imprison for a period not exceeding seven days for any contempt committed in court. Holding that a county court judge had no power to proceed against a person for a contempt committed out of court, Cockburn CJ said¹⁵:

'The legislature had anticipated the probability of contempts and the necessity of giving power to the courts of repressing these contempts when occurring in the court itself. [He then set out the provisions of s 113 and thereafter continued:] But it is said that, although the legislature has thus limited the power to contempt in court, that was not intended to alter the law as to the general jurisdiction of a court of record, as it is possessed by inferior courts, of fine or imprisoning to any extent at their discretion. This would lead to a singular inconsistency. If a contempt were committed in the face of the Court, the judge could only imprison the offender for seven days or fine him 5*l.*, while for a contempt out of court he might fine him several hundreds, or commit him for months, or even years. We therefore must understand the legislature to have confined the power to the instances given and to the extent limited.'

Had the law been left as it was at the time of Lefroy's case¹³, counsel for the defendant's submission would have been well founded. But, being clearly unsatisfactory, it was not.

Before turning to the later legislation, reference should here be made to the form of the interim injunction granted in the present case. It reads in this way:

'It is ordered that the Defendant S. M. Baker (married woman) by herself, her servants or agents or otherwise, be restrained from evicting or attempting to evict the Plaintiff without due process of law from the premises occupied by the Plaintiff in the dwellinghouse situate at and known as 105, Sutherland

¹⁴ I.e. the County Courts Act 1846

- a Avenue, London, W.9, or from interfering with the Plaintiff's reasonable enjoyment of the same, until after the trial of this action or until further order.'

On the back of that order was this pro forma printed endorsement:

'Take Notice that unless you obey the directions contained in this Order you will be guilty of Contempt of Court and will be liable to be committed to prison.'

- b But so badly had the defendant behaved that, when the application for her committal was first made on 13th August, plaintiffs' counsel made it clear to the judge that they would never return to no 105 in view of what had happened, and that intimation was repeated when the trial opened on 20th September. Nevertheless, the first head of relief sought in the particulars of claim continued to be an injunction—

- c 'restraining the defendant . . . from evicting or from attempting to evict the plaintiff from the said furnished room without due process of law . . .'

While there was no formal abandonment of that request, it was not in fact pursued at the trial and no injunction was granted. Instead, the learned judge awarded each plaintiff exemplary damages, assessed by reference to the indignity and cruelty to which they had been subjected by the defendant, and committed her to prison. d 'For her contempt of Court in deliberately breaching the injunctions', meaning thereby the interim orders made on 30th June.

- e Before indicating my conclusions regarding his jurisdiction to make such an order, I must complete the legislative history. The County Courts Act 1865, s 1 (8), empowered those courts to grant injunctions in certain circumstances, but not in cases of nuisance. Then came the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, s 25 (8) of which conferred on the High Court power to grant injunctions—

'in all cases in which it shall appear to the Court to be just or convenient that such an Order should be made . . .'

Furthermore, s 89 provided:

- f 'Every inferior Court . . . shall, as regards all causes of action within its jurisdiction for the time being, have power to grant, and shall grant in any proceeding before such Court, such relief, redress, or remedy, or combination of remedies . . . in as full and ample a manner as might and ought to be done in the like case by the High Court of Justice.'

- g In *Martin v Bannister*¹⁶ it was held in the Queen's Bench Division (and later in the Court of Appeal¹⁷) that this legislation empowered a county court judge to grant an injunction in nuisance and to enforce it by attachment, Kelly CB saying¹⁸—

- h 'The powers of every inferior Court have been enlarged by s. 89 . . . If a Court has power to prohibit a wrong it ought also to have power to enforce its prohibition . . . It is unreasonable to suppose the power to grant injunctions was meant to be nothing but a bare power, with no means of compelling obedience. Otherwise the nuisance may be continued for ever, and the plaintiff put to the necessity of bringing action after action for damages . . .'

The plaintiff understandably places reliance on the judgment of the Court of Appeal, where Bramwell LJ observed¹⁹:

- j 'It is said an attachment is not part of the remedy given by the Court, but a punishment inflicted for disobedience to an injunction, but that is not really so; it is part of the remedy, which consists of an injunction and consequent attachment. The remedy is, in fact, an injunction enforceable by attachment.'

Counsel for the defendant stressed that the injunction there granted was against the continuation of a nuisance and that, at the time of the application for committal, the nuisance remained and was likely to continue. The order for committal was therefore not simply a punishment for the past breach but a means whereby future obedience to the injunction might be promptly and permanently secured. Whether that distinction from the facts of the present case necessitates a different conclusion must hereafter be considered. a

And finally to the County Courts Act 1959. Section 74 (marginally entitled 'General ancillary jurisdiction') corresponds with s 89 of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act 1873, and has already been quoted verbatim by Salmon LJ. Our particular concern is, of course, the connotation of the words— b

'such relief, redress or remedy or combination of remedies . . . as ought to be granted or given in the like case by the High Court and in as full and ample a manner.' c

Counsel for the defendant has drawn attention to certain of its sections (such as s 30 and s 127) which expressly confer on the county court powers which the High Court inherently possesses. He has understandably dwelt on s 157, recalling as it does s 113 of the statute 9 & 10 Vict c 95, the ambit of which was considered in *Lefroy's case*²⁰. In effect, it provides that, in the case of certain contempts in the face of the court, the judge may commit for a period not exceeding one month. Counsel has questioned the necessity for any such provision if s 74 is to be given the wide interpretation here contended for by the plaintiff. At first sight, this question appeared both difficult and important, but I think the answer to it is this: s 157 confers on the court simply a power to punish; it grants a remedy to no party and it redresses no complaint; its sole purpose is to provide easily activated machinery whereby the court of its own volition can ensure that justice shall be administered fully, fairly and swiftly. But when the county court judge commits under s 74 is he not simply punishing? This question was, as we have seen, considered by Bramwell LJ in *Martin v Bannister*¹, and the answer is that he is not, for— d

'punishment . . . is part of the remedy, which consists of an injunction and consequent attachment. The remedy is, in fact, an injunction enforceable by attachment.' e

The comment of counsel for the defendant is that this is not so where the nuisance complained of has been terminated and there is no likelihood of its committal. Or, to take the facts of the present case, the misconduct of the defendant having driven the tenants permanently out of their homes, he says that for that wrong the judge granted each of them 'redress' by an award of exemplary damages, and therefore to commit the defendant for breach of the interim injunction would be punishment alone and, as such, beyond the jurisdiction of the county court. With this I do not agree. It is beyond doubt that on the facts of the present case the Divisional Court could have committed the defendant—see, for example, *R v Davies*² and *R v Edwards, ex parte Welsh Church Temporalities Comrs*³. In *Phonographic Performance Ltd v Amusement Caterers (Peckham) Ltd*⁴ the defendants had wilfully disobeyed the court's order, but later complied with it, and the question at issue was whether the court was nevertheless empowered to commit for the past disobedience. Cross J dealt with the matter by saying⁵: f

³ (1933) 49 TLR 383

a 'There is no doubt that the order of the court was wilfully disobeyed. There is no question here of unintentional disobedience of the order, because the company and the directors never tried to obey the order or thought of obeying it until they instructed solicitors. On the other hand, the order has now been complied with. What, in those circumstances, is the position of the court in a case of civil contempt? As is pointed out in Halsbury's Laws of England, 3rd ed., vol. 8, p. 20, where there has been wilful disobedience to an order of the court and a measure of contumacy on the part of the defendants, then civil contempt, what is called contempt in procedure, "bears a two-fold character, implying as between the parties to the proceedings merely a right to exercise and a liability to submit to a form of civil execution, but as between the party in default and the state, a penal or disciplinary jurisdiction to be exercised by the court in the public interest." Civil contempt bears much the same character as criminal contempt. That is brought out very clearly by Rigby L.J. in his judgment in *Seaward v. Paterson*⁶, where in reference to an argument addressed to him by counsel, he says: "Unless I entirely misapprehended that argument, it went so far as this, that the court has no jurisdiction to commit for contempt by way of punishment; but that the jurisdiction is an ancillary or subsidiary jurisdiction in order to secure that the plaintiff in a suit shall have his rights. I do not think that that can be for a moment maintained". Later he says: "That there is a jurisdiction to punish for contempt of court is undoubted." I think he is talking here of civil contempt, not only of criminal contempt. "It has been exercised for a very long time—for longer than any of us can remember—and it is punitive jurisdiction founded upon this, that it is for the good, not of the plaintiff or of any party to the action, but of the public, that the orders of court should not be disregarded."

Then Cross J added⁷:

f 'I think, therefore, that although the order has now been complied with, I must consider whether it can be said in this case that the directors of the company were deliberately setting the court at defiance and were really treating the order of the court as not worthy of notice. If that is the true view, then notwithstanding that the order has now been complied with, it may well be that a punishment ought to be inflicted on them.'

It is worthy of note, that subject to certain conditions, an order for their committal was made by the learned judge in that case.

g I respectfully adopt this passage as accurately setting out what the High Court can do in the case of past disobedience to its orders. Then, since under s 74 the county court may—

'grant such relief, redress or remedy . . . as ought to be granted or given in the like case by the High Court and in as full and ample a manner', h why was his Honour Judge Curtis-Raleigh not free to commit the defendant as he did? The grotesque implications of holding that he had no such power have already been illustrated by Salmon L.J. The case of the cat is particularly apt, for the defendant and her husband threatened to kill a cat whose companionship one of the tenants had enjoyed for several years before their arrival. Nevertheless, the answer proffered by counsel for the defendant is that by doing so the county court judge conferred on the plaintiffs no such 'relief, redress or remedy' as at the date of the committal they were still seeking; instead, they were relying on the defendant's misconduct simply as a reason for seeking exemplary damages, and those they were awarded; more than that they did not seek. The point raised and brilliantly developed by counsel for the defendant is an important one, for, as Pollock B said in *Martin v Bannister*⁸, 'where the liberty of the subject is affected the language must be very clear and explicit to justify imprisonment'. But I hope that I have already sufficiently indicated the manner in which, as I think, it should be dealt with. If in circumstances such as those we are here dealing with, the county court judge had no power to commit, it would be an empty boast were he to claim that his power was 'as full and ample' as that of the Divisional Court. Yet that is exactly what s 74 of the 1959 Act conferred on him. It is on these grounds that I concur with Salmon LJ in holding that his Honour Judge Curtis-Raleigh had jurisdiction to commit the defendant as he did.

STAMP LJ. I agree and have only to add my own appreciation of the clear, powerful and altogether admirable argument of counsel for the defendant.

[Counsel for the defendant addressed further argument to the court.]

SALMON LJ. On 1st November this court ordered that the defendant should be allowed out on bail pending the hearing of the appeal. On that date, according to the order of his Honour Judge Leslie, she had a further 12 days to serve in prison. When we granted the application for bail we did so because, if the point of law which had been taken on her behalf had turned out to be a good one, she would have completed her sentence before the appeal had been heard and that would have been most unfortunate. I did say on that occasion as clearly as I could that, if it should turn out that the point of law taken on her behalf was a bad one and that the county court judge had jurisdiction to send her to prison, the strong probability was that, in that event, this court would order her to be returned to prison to complete her sentence. I also said that it was most important that this should be made plain to her; and I have no doubt that this was done. This morning the point of law was decided against her. We had no doubt that the county court judge had jurisdiction to commit to prison for the contempt of which the county court judge found the defendant had been guilty.

Counsel for the defendant has made an eloquent plea to this court asking us to show mercy and basing that plea on an affidavit which the defendant swore on 30th October. In that affidavit she says, in effect, that, although she accepts legal responsibility for what was done, since she was the landlord of the premises, nevertheless she was not personally responsible for what was done. She very much regrets any inconvenience that may have been caused to the tenants; it certainly was not her intention to evict them.

The learned county court judge found that this defendant, who was a university graduate, was an intelligent, competent and resourceful woman. She conducted her own defence in the county court. She knew that the application to commit her was being made on the basis that she had deliberately embarked on a policy of terrorising her tenants in defiance of the court's order for the purpose of evicting them from their homes. She never suggested in addressing the county court that she was acting under her husband's or anybody else's domination. She never put forward, as the learned county court judge pointed out, that she was in any ignorance of what was going on in the house. Having listened day after day to tenant after tenant giving evidence of the fear and misery which they had suffered at her hands, she did not express one word of regret or apology to them or (which is perhaps not so important) to the court for disobeying the court's order.

If what she is now putting forward in the affidavit of 30th October is a genuine explanation of what occurred, it seems to me quite incredible that she did not go into the witness box to offer that explanation in the county court. A woman as intelligent and highly educated and resourceful as the defendant showed herself a to be must have realised that if she went into the witness box and told this story she would be subjected to cross-examination and that her story was unlikely to stand up. She heard the witnesses whom she did call cross-examined with devastating effect.

b I have already set out the facts which the learned judge found. There was abundant and compelling evidence that she was responsible for the persecution which these tenants endured. I do not refer, and the learned judge did not refer, merely to legal responsibility. What he meant and said was that she was one of the persons at any rate who initiated and carried out this policy of terrorisation for the purpose of getting rid of the tenants. The story told in her affidavit that she did not really intend to evict them and that she was hoping to live in the house might have been very difficult to support in light of the circumstances that she had similarly persecuted the tenants of two other houses close by in order to evict them and had succeeded in doing so. After all is said and done, this is about as serious a case of contempt of court as it is possible to imagine. This defendant's guilt consists not merely in disobeying an order of the court, which could certainly easily be overlooked; she disobeyed an order of the court which was clearly designed to protect the liberty of the individual and the right of humble tenants to be left in peaceful possession of their own homes. She did this for money, because if she could get these tenants out she would be able to relet the rooms for very much more money than they were paying. For that sordid purpose this policy of persecution and terrorisation was employed in defiance of the court's order.

c In spite of all that has been so eloquently said on her behalf and bearing in mind that the power to commit for contempt should be exercised sparingly and with the greatest caution, I am convinced that we should be doing much less than our duty if we did not order that this defendant should return to prison and serve the remainder of her sentence. We should be doing less than our duty, because not only does she richly deserve the punishment which has been meted out to her, but there are many other unscrupulous landlords who might be tempted to follow her example and many other humble decent tenants who might be subjected to the same beastly methods of terrorisation and persecution were we to allow the defendant to go free. To my mind it would be a real encouragement to landlords such as her to act as she did and it would be exposing the tenants to a real danger should the law (as the learned judge below put it) sit limply by. It is no pleasure for this court ever to order that a woman shall return to prison. In my view, in this case we have no reasonable choice other than to make that order and I would make it.

d EDMUND DAVIES LJ. Salmon LJ has entirely expressed my views and I agree entirely in the order he proposes.

STAMP LJ. I entirely agree with everything that Salmon LJ has said and I agree with the order that he proposes.

e Appeal dismissed. Ordered that the defendant be returned to prison for a further 12 days in accordance with the order of his Honour Judge Leslie.

Ecclesiastical law – Clergyman – Offence – Neglect of duty – Analogy with common law negligence – False analogy – Neglect of duty failure to perform ecclesiastical duty without due cause – Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Measure 1963, s 14.

Ecclesiastical law – Limitation of action – Conduct occurring within ‘period of three years ending with the day on which the proceedings are instituted’ – Offence – Conduct unbecoming office and work of clerk in Holy Orders – Offence charged comprising series of acts – Number of specified acts occurring outside limitation period – Appropriate direction to be made in circumstances – Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Measure 1963, s 16.

Ecclesiastical law – Censure – Factors to be considered – Paramount consideration gravity of offence – Censure of deprivation only to be pronounced where offence merits severe punishment.

Ecclesiastical law – Consistory court – Proceedings against priest or deacon – Chancellor sitting with assessors – Questions by assessors – Discretion of chancellor.

The appellant rector of a parish was convicted at a consistory court before the chancellor and assessors of three offences of serious neglect of duty and four offences of conduct unbecoming the office and work of a clerk in Holy Orders, under s 14^a of the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Measure 1963. The chancellor, considering it his duty to pass sentence pro salute animarum and deeming it necessary to part the appellant and his cure for ever, had pronounced a censure of deprivation in respect of each of the seven offences. One of the three offences of serious neglect of duty was in respect of a refusal to baptise a child. Each of the offences of conduct unbecoming consisted of a series of acts specified in a number of particulars and all but one of them specified a number of particulars which occurred outside the three year limitation period imposed by s 16^b of the 1963 Measure. On appeal against conviction and censure, the appellant, inter alia, contended that a consistory court was not competent under the 1963 Measure to try a charge relating to refusal to baptise a child.

Held – (i) A consistory court had under s 6 (1) (a)^c of the Measure jurisdiction to try the charge relating to baptism since the act of refusing to baptise a child did not fall within the jurisdiction of the Court of Ecclesiastical Causes Reserved as an offence ‘involving matter of doctrine’ (see p 1017 c to e, post).

(ii) The appeal against the convictions on the three charges of serious neglect of duty would be allowed because (a) the chancellor had, in his summing-up, misdirected

^a Section 14, so far as material, provides: ‘(1) Proceedings may be instituted under this Measure against any of the persons specified ... charging ... (b) ... any ... offence against the laws ecclesiastical, including—(i) conduct unbecoming the office and work of a clerk in Holy Orders, or (ii) serious ... neglect of duty ...’

^b Section 16, so far as material, is set out at p 1019 c, post

^c Section 6 (1), so far as material, provides: ‘... the consistory court of a diocese has original jurisdiction to hear and determine—(a) proceedings upon articles charging an offence ... not being an offence involving matter of doctrine, ritual or ceremonial ...’

a the assessors by likening 'neglect of duty' to common law negligence; there was no analogy for on the true construction of s 14 of the Measure 'neglect of duty' meant failure to perform an ecclesiastical duty without due cause, and (b) the court was not satisfied that, if properly directed as to the meaning of those words, the assessors would inevitably have come to the same conclusion (see p 1015 b and j to p 1016 b and p 1018 j to p 1019 a, post).

b (iii) In relation to the four charges of conduct unbecoming, the chancellor had misdirected the assessors by informing them that, in relation to each charge if they found only one of the particulars which occurred within the limitation period proved they could convict of the offence if they were satisfied that it constituted conduct unbecoming, and stating that they should not specify which of the particulars they found proved. Since in relation to one of those charges there was no doubt that if properly directed the assessors would have come to the same conclusion the appeal c against conviction on that charge would be dismissed, but in respect of the other three charges the appeals would be allowed (see p 1020 g h and j to p 1021 b, post).

d (iv) In determining the appropriate censure to be pronounced on a person convicted of an offence under the Measure the paramount consideration was the gravity of the offence; a censure of deprivation should not be pronounced in respect of an offence which did not merit such severe punishment merely on the ground that such a sentence was in the interests of the parish. Since a censure of deprivation would be wholly out of proportion to the gravity of the offence in respect of which the appellant's conviction had been confirmed, that censure would accordingly be varied by substituting a censure of rebuke (see p 1021 j to p 1022 a and p 1023 a, post).

e Per Curiam. (i) In future, if the articles contain a charge of 'unbecoming conduct' which consists of a series of acts specified in a number of particulars within the limitation period the chancellor should (a) ask the assessors to state which of the particulars they find proved and (b) direct the assessors that they cannot convict unless they find more than one of the particulars proved and moreover in respect of the particulars which they find proved the accused has been found guilty of 'unbecoming conduct' (see p 1020 j, post).

f (ii) There is no obligation on the chancellor to invite assessors to put questions. If an assessor wishes to put a question, the chancellor has a discretion whether to put the question himself if he thinks it is a proper one or allow the assessor to do so (see p 1021 d, post).

Appeal

j This was an appeal by the Reverend Michael Bland, rector of Buckland with Laverton and Stanton with Snowhill, in the diocese of Gloucester, against his conviction at Gloucester consistory court before the chancellor (the Reverend E Garth Moore) and assessors of three offences of serious neglect of duty and four offences of conduct unbecoming the office and work of a clerk in Holy Orders, and the censure of deprivation pronounced against him in respect of each of the seven offences under the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Measure 1963. The appellant had been charged with eight offences under the Measure but he was acquitted on the first. The second, third and fourth charges alleged serious neglect of duty in that he refused to baptise a child (charge 2); he prevented a father from entering the church to declare publicly his dissent to the marriage of his son at the time of the publication of his son's banns of marriage (charge 3); and he repelled a man from Holy Communion without lawful cause (charge 4). Charges 5-8 alleged conduct unbecoming the office and work of a clerk in Holy Orders in that he wrote rude letters to parishioners and other persons and in particular eight letters were specified (charge 5); he made offensive and hurtful remarks to parishioners and in particular five instances were specified (charge 6); he indulged in fits of temper in church and in particular four occasions were specified (charge 7); he indulged in fits of temper in the course of his dealings with parishioners and in particular three occasions were specified (charge 8). The respondent to the appeal was the Archdeacon of Cheltenham who had been nominated as promoter under s 25 of the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Measure 1963. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

6th April 1970. THE DEPUTY DEAN read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal by the Rev Michael Bland from the judgment of the Gloucester Consistory Court so far as it relates to the convictions and several censures pronounced against him. The appellant was charged with four offences of serious neglect of duty and four offences of conduct unbecoming the office and work of a clerk in Holy Orders. He was found not guilty on the first charge and guilty on the second to the eighth charges inclusive. Censure of deprivation was pronounced against him on each of the seven charges on which he was convicted.

The appellant was ordained a deacon in 1952 and a priest in 1953. He was instituted as rector of Buckland with Laverton and Stanton with Snowhill in the diocese of Gloucester on 16th June 1958. The respondent is the Archdeacon of Cheltenham, who was nominated as promoter under s 25 of the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Measure 1963 (hereinafter called 'the Measure').

At the hearing, we allowed the appellant to amend the notice of appeal by adding fresh grounds in relation to the second, third and fourth charges. In the amended notice of appeal a further point was raised with regard to the second, third and fourth charges, namely that each of the acts with which the said three charges was concerned was in itself an ecclesiastical offence and should not have been charged in the articles as, in each case, serious neglect of duty. We agree with the view expressed by the chancellor that if the act or omission complained of is in itself an ecclesiastical offence, it should be charged as such rather than as serious neglect of duty or conduct unbecoming the office and work of a clerk in Holy Orders. In some cases, however, while an act or omission is in itself an ecclesiastical offence, it can also fall within the ambit of 'neglect of duty' or 'conduct unbecoming' within the meaning of s 14 of the Measure. On this ground the chancellor declined to strike out these charges and we agree with his decision.

Second, third and fourth charges

A further ground raised by the amended notice of appeal was that the chancellor misdirected the assessors by introducing into his summing-up the concept of the duty of care and negligence, so confusing neglect of ecclesiastical duty (or rather the ecclesiastical offence concerned with the duty in question) with the negligent performance of such duty which was not alleged or proved against the appellant in respect of any of the above offences. The appellant was convicted on each of the second, third a and fourth charges of serious neglect of duty under s 14 of the Measure. Similar words first appeared in s 2 of the Incumbents (Discipline) Measure 1947. There were only a few proceedings instituted under that Measure, one case being *Watkins-Grubb v Hilder*¹—an appeal to the provincial court of the Province of Canterbury in 1965. There does not appear, however, to have been any argument over the meaning of these words and there is nothing in the judgment to indicate that the court was asked to make a judicial determination on them.

b We have been told that these proceedings were the first to be instituted under the Measure. The chancellor, therefore, in directing the assessors as to the true interpretation of 'neglect of duty' in the Measure was unaided by authority. We interpret these words as meaning the failure to perform an ecclesiastical duty without due cause. A clerk who holds ecclesiastical preferment is guilty of neglect of duty if he fails to perform the duties attending to that preferment without due cause. Proceedings may be instituted under this section against an archbishop, any diocesan bishop or any suffragan bishop commissioned by a diocesan bishop or any other bishop or a priest or deacon. Each of these has ecclesiastical duties to perform although varying widely in their nature according to their respective offices and preferments. Failure to perform such duty without due cause is neglect of duty and if it is serious, constitutes an offence under the Measure. These words do not seem to us to require any elaboration and could be explained to the assessors in simple terms.

d The chancellor, however, in directing the assessors as to the meaning of these words, compared 'neglect' in the Measure with negligence at common law. He said:

'Now, neglect is obviously, as the word implies, closely associated with something with which perhaps we are more familiar, namely, negligence. Negligence, though often used as synonymous with carelessness, in law means something more than carelessness. It means the breach of a duty to take care. You can be careless when you do not owe a duty. But if you are careless when you do owe a duty, then you become guilty of negligence. If I may give you a very simple example; if in my own room I trip over my own hearthrug, I may well be careless and I may well suffer for it. But I am not negligent, because at that point I am not owing anybody the duty of care. But, if I am carrying your teapot when I trip over the hearthrug, assuming that I am careless in tripping over the hearthrug, inasmuch as I owe you a duty to take care of your teapot, I am being negligent. And the standard of care which is expected of me is normally the sort of care which the average person, the person whom lawyers have described for a great many years now as the man on top of the Clapham omnibus, would display. I am not expected to display an excessive amount of care. I am expected to display merely the care which an ordinary, reasonable, normal person would display, and it is if I fall below that on an occasion when I owe a duty of care that I am said to be negligent. By the same token, if a man sets himself up as having a special expertise—if, for example, he is a doctor—he is expected to show both the care and skill and knowledge which the ordinary medical practitioner has. He is not expected to perform as brilliantly as that brilliant man up in London; but he is not expected, equally, to fall below the standard of an ordinary, normal practitioner. And, if a man is a Clerk in Holy Orders, the care which he is expected to display on the occasions when he owes a duty of a professional sort, if I may so put it, is the care which you would ordinarily expect from the ordinary average run of parsons, if I may use such an expression. Now, neglect is very like negligence.'

j This comparison of 'neglect of duty' with negligence at common law was unnecessary and irrelevant and was likely to confuse and mislead the assessors. A duty to take reasonable care was not the duty which the appellant had to perform and failure to perform that duty was not the offence charged. We have, of course, to consider the summing-up as a whole. Although the later directions by the chancellor might well, if they had stood alone, have been adequate, we cannot escape the conclusion that whenever the chancellor referred to neglect, the assessors would associate it in their minds with failure by the appellant of the duty to take reasonable care. We were reminded by counsel for the respondent that the assessors were not a common jury but were a select panel of experienced and intelligent persons. It was argued, therefore, that the assessors would not be so likely to be confused or misled. We find this argument untenable, as the assessors are bound to accept the directions of the chancellor on the law and are not entitled to form their own opinions about it. We are driven to the conclusion that the chancellor misdirected the assessors on the meaning of 'neglect of duty' in respect of each of these three charges.

As the appellant has established that there was a misdirection as to the law on a fundamental question, we have to consider what is the proper course for this court to take. Under the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction (Discipline) Rules 1964² (hereinafter called 'the Rules'), this court has very wide powers. The court under r 43 in determining the question or questions raised by the appeal has power to confirm, reverse or vary any finding of the consistory court against which the appeal is brought. Under r 42 the court may require or allow any witness who gave evidence for the purpose of the trial to give evidence for the purposes of the appeal. If either party proposes to apply to the court to exercise this power he should, if practicable, give notice in writing to the other party and to the registrar of the appellate court, but without prejudice to the exercise of the powers without notice. Neither party has given such notice or asked us at the hearing to exercise this power. Although the court would not hesitate to use this power if it considered it necessary, as a general rule the court would use the power sparingly, and does not consider it right to do so in this case. This court has to consider whether, notwithstanding the fact that the appellant has established misdirection on the law, a substantial miscarriage of justice has actually occurred. The test we apply is, whether on a right direction, a reasonable panel of assessors would inevitably have come to the same conclusion. We give our decision after we have considered the other grounds of appeal raised by the appellant.

Second charge

The second alleged offence was serious neglect of duty in October 1966 in refusing to baptise a daughter of Mr and Mrs Haynes of Cornisk Cottage, Laverton. This court agrees with the chancellor's view that this should have been charged not as serious neglect of duty, but as an ecclesiastical offence of refusing to baptise.

The appellant in his answer to the consistory court said that 'he demurred at baptising the child on grounds of doctrine and conscience', these grounds being: (a) Neither of the parents were regular communicants. The father was not a believer and declined to attend church. (b) There was no reasonable prospect that the child would be given a Christian upbringing or instruction, or any encouragement in the Christian faith. (c) To administer the sacrament of baptism in this case would have been an instance of indiscriminate infant baptism which the appellant holds to be contrary to the true doctrine of the Christian faith and to Holy Scripture.

The appellant contended before us, as he had before the consistory court, that the offence charged was an offence against the laws ecclesiastical, involving matters of doctrine, and the consistory court was not competent under the provisions of the Measure to try the same. In his final speech, counsel for the appellant abandoned this contention. As, however, the attention of the court has been called to the question of jurisdiction, the court must decide the question. We note four relevant references in the Measure: (1) According to s 6 (1) (a), the consistory court has original jurisdiction to hear and determine 'proceedings upon articles charging an offence . . . not being an offence involving matter of doctrine, ritual or ceremonial'. (2) By s 10 (1):

a 'The Court of Ecclesiastical Causes Reserved has original jurisdiction to hear and determine—(a) proceedings upon articles charging an offence against the laws ecclesiastical involving matter of doctrine, ritual or ceremonial . . .'

(3) Section 14 (1) (a) specifically distinguishes from other offences, such as unbecoming conduct or neglect of duty, an offence against the laws ecclesiastical involving matter of doctrine, ritual or ceremonial. (4) Part VI provides for an alleged offence involving matter of doctrine, ritual or ceremonial to be dealt with by the Court of Ecclesiastical Causes Reserved.

b This court has, therefore, to consider the significance of the phrase 'involving matter of doctrine'. The phrase in s 2 of the Incumbents (Discipline) Measure 1947 was slightly different, namely 'in respect of any question of doctrine, ritual or ceremonial'. The definition of offences as to doctrine in Halsburys Laws of England³ referred to this phrase but not to the phrase which is used in the Measure. We do not think it would be wise to attempt an exhaustive definition. Certain offences clearly involve a matter of doctrine, e.g a public statement (as in a sermon or a book) denying the doctrine of the Trinity or of the deity of Christ. These offences would be charged as such and would be referred without hesitation to the Court of Ecclesiastical Causes Reserved. This alleged offence is of a different nature. The act of refusal to baptise a child is not a doctrinal offence as such and is not charged as such. It is concerned with pastoral work and activity. The motive behind the refusal might be partly connected with a doctrinal view held by the person refusing but the act of refusing to baptise cannot be called an offence against doctrine nor was it in this case charged as such. Moreover, as was pointed out in *Watkins-Grubb v Hilder*⁴:

c ' . . . it is clear beyond question that when offences are proved it is no defence to allege that the offence was caused by a conscientious objection to the performance of statutory duties or other lawful requirements.'

It is enough for us to say that on this question we agree with the decision of the chancellor and hold that the consistory court had jurisdiction to try this charge.

d The appellant further contended that the chancellor misdirected the assessors 'that in deciding whether or not the [appellant] had failed or refused to baptise the child in question they were not concerned with his theological views'. At the time of the alleged offence (October 1966), the strict law was as stated in canon 68 of the Canons of 1604, that to refuse or delay to baptise 'any child brought to the Church' to be baptised would incur a penalty of three months suspension by the bishop. And the chancellor referred also to 'the jus commune, the Common Law of the e Church', as being the source of the canon. Further, in the Book of Common Prayer of 1662, the third rubric in the service for the public baptism of infants prescribes that the parents should give notice of a baptism 'over night or in the morning before the beginning of Morning Prayer', and the first rubric for the service of private baptism of children expects people to arrange for the baptism of their children within a fortnight of birth 'unless upon a great and reasonable cause, to be approved f by the Curate' (i.e. the incumbent). It was argued by counsel for the appellant that the alleged offence was not crystallised, in that the child was not 'brought to the Church' to be baptised as stated in canon 68, and the baptism then refused. That may be technically correct, so far as canon 68 is concerned; but the prayer book rubric ensures that no child should be 'brought to the Church' as stated in canon 68 without prior notice, and indeed since 1939 at any rate the Canterbury Convocation

g has required that at least a week's notice of baptism should be given. Mr Haynes, the father of the child, came to give such notice, although no day for the baptism was given and the appellant was charged with then refusing to baptise the child, although he said that he was thinking in terms of delay. We hold, however, that if at the interview with Mr Haynes, the appellant evinced a clear and final intention not to baptise the child if and when brought to the church for baptism, it would constitute a refusal: see *Banister v Thompson*⁵, where a letter by the priest announcing his definite intention not to administer the sacrament to a person was held to be a refusal. a

The chancellor, although asked to do so, declined to leave for the consideration of the assessors the question whether the duty to baptise had crystallised. In our view he should have done so and directed the assessors more clearly than he did that they could not find a refusal unless what was said at the interview by the appellant evinced a clear and final intention not to baptise the child when brought to the church. b

It should, indeed, be noted that in 1939 the Canterbury Convocation put out certain recommendations as a guide to bishops in their dioceses and the clergy in their parishes with regard to the administration of baptism in these modern days and in the modern situation in the parishes. These were widely acted on. But an even more important step on the same lines was taken in 1957, to provide some relief from the strict letter of the law as in canon 68. In that year an Act of Convocation, solemnly promulgated by the then archbishop, laid down the principles which should now be followed pastorally regarding baptism, godparents, confirmation and the communicant life. These recommendations did not have the force of statute law, but they had great moral force as the considered judgment of the highest and ancient synod of the Province. They were guidelines for pastoral work, based on sound Anglican doctrine. They have subsequently been incorporated in canons B 22, 23, 24 and 27 of the new Canon Law of 1969. These canons have statutory authority through a Church Assembly Measure passed through Parliament. They have tried to avoid any indiscriminate baptism of infants, without going to the opposite more rigorous extreme. It is clear that between 1957 and the legalising of the new canons in 1969, priests could not be regarded as worthy of censure if they followed the 1957 Convocation recommendations; indeed, they were urged to adopt them and follow them, by the archbishops, bishops and others of the clergy in both Convocations. In this particular case, therefore, the appellant would have been quite justified, not in a blunt refusal to baptise the child but in asking for some delay so that he could instruct the parents further and consider with them all that is involved in the solemn rite of baptism, for the child, for the parents and the godparents, and for the church community. In his evidence he maintained that he was thinking of delay rather than complete refusal, and if that had been accepted, the alleged offence could not be sustained. c

In fairness to the chancellor, it should be said that he had not been able to get a copy of the 1969 canons and it may well be that these official documents and decisions were not present to his mind. If they had been we feel sure that he would, as he should, have called the attention of the assessors to the modified position, certainly since the 1957 Act of Convocation and to some extent since the Convocation recommendations of 1939. If he had, the assessors might well have been disposed to take the view that although the appellant was muddled in his statements and in expressing his views, he was influenced by high ideals of the importance of baptism, which are generally consistent with those expressed in several official reports and decisions of the Convocations and in the report and resolutions of the Anglican bishops at the 1948 Lambeth Conference. This would have been highly relevant on the issue whether the neglect of duty (if any) was serious. f

We have now to decide whether, notwithstanding the misdirection by the chancellor, there has been any substantial miscarriage of justice. We are by no means satisfied that if there had been a proper direction, the assessors would inevitably have come to the conclusion which they did. We, therefore, allow the appeal against conviction on the second charge. i a [The Deputy Dean then dealt with the third and fourth charges. The appeals against conviction on both charges were allowed on the grounds that the court was not satisfied that if the assessors had been properly directed on the meaning of the words 'neglect of duty' they would inevitably come to the conclusion that the appellant was guilty.]

b Fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth charges

Charges five, six, seven and eight each charged the appellant with conduct unbecoming the office and work of a clerk in Holy Orders. Each of these offences consisted of a series of acts specified in a number of particulars. Moreover each of them, except charge seven, specified a number of particulars which occurred outside the period of three years ending with the day on which the proceedings were instituted, namely, 16th May 1968. Section 16 of the Measure provides:

c 'No proceedings under this Measure shall be instituted unless the act or omission constituting the offence, or the last of them if the offence consists of a series of acts or omissions, occurred within the period of three years ending with the day on which proceedings are instituted . . .'

d At the hearing, counsel for the appellant contended that each of these counts was bad for duplicity and applied to the chancellor to strike out each of these charges on the grounds of duplicity, and alternatively, to strike out each of the particulars in charges five, six and eight which were outside the limitation period. The chancellor dismissed these applications. The appellant now contends (1) that the chancellor should have upheld the objection that each of these charges was bad for duplicity and should have required the amendment of the articles so as to strike out the particulars which were outside the limitation period, as barred by s 16 of the Measure and so as to allege every other particular as itself amounting to conduct unbecoming the office and work of a clerk in Holy Orders; (2) that there was a misdirection by the chancellor in that he directed the assessors that they might convict the appellant of each of such charges although they found only one of the particulars relating to a matter occurring after 17th May 1965 proved, and (3) that in returning their verdict they should not specify which of the particulars they found proved.

e Counsel for the appellant contended that this court should follow the practice in the criminal courts under which a count in an indictment containing more than one criminal offence is held to be bad for duplicity. Counsel for the respondent, in a careful and reasoned argument, contended that apart from s 28 (a) and (c) of the Measure, proceedings instituted under s 28 of the Measure were not wholly in the nature of criminal proceedings at an assize court and that the Indictments Act 1915, r 4, Sch 1, had no application. He contended that there was no such thing as duplicity relating to articles under the Measure. We do not find it necessary to decide this question. The form of pleading is governed by the Measure and the rules made under it. It is clear that where more than one offence is charged, each offence must be separately stated. Form 11 in the Appendix to the rules is a specimen form of articles (similar in form to a complaint):

g 'Articles
Statement of Offence
e.g. conduct unbecoming the office and work of a clerk in Holy Orders.

i 'Particulars of Offence
(Here set out in numbered Articles the alleged acts or omissions constituting the offence, giving dates and places where possible. If more than one offence is charged, state each offence separately under the heading "Statement of First Offence", "Statement of Second Offence", etc., followed by the Articles containing the particulars of that offence.)'

Rule 65 provides that:

'Non-compliance with any of these rules shall not render any proceedings void unless the court or commission before whom the proceedings are pending when the irregularity is discovered so directs, but the proceedings may be set aside, either wholly or in part, as irregular, or may be amended or otherwise dealt with in such manner and upon such terms as the court thinks fit . . .'

The Measure and the rules, therefore, clearly prescribe that both in the complaint and articles, each offence should be charged separately and the consistory court has full powers to deal with any non-compliance of the rules. If, therefore, the consistory court was satisfied that there had been non-compliance with the rules, it could and should have dealt with it in one of the ways provided in r 65. In future, any accused who objects to the articles on the grounds that each offence is not charged separately should object to them as not complying with the rules and there is no need to resort to an objection on the ground of duplicity. In our judgment, the chancellor came to a correct conclusion in refusing to strike out the particulars of offence of each of these four charges inasmuch as no single particular alleged an offence in itself and each of the offences charged consisted of a series of acts or omissions.

A single act or omission cannot constitute a series of acts or omissions and, indeed, the particulars of each offence showed that the offence charged consisted of more than one act. Moreover the only ground on which the particulars of incidents which were outside the limitation rule could properly be included was that they did not constitute separate offences simpliciter but were part of a series of acts or omissions constituting an offence.

In charge five, the respondent did not choose to rely on each of the six letters as in itself constituting an offence. If he had they would have been separately stated as six different offences. Instead he chose to rely on one offence which constituted a series of acts. Further, the respondent introduced into charges five, six and eight, acts which were outside the limitation period and could only be taken into consideration in accordance with s 16 of the Measure. This rather complicated situation necessitated a careful and accurate direction of the chancellor. The direction of the chancellor with regard to the particulars outside the limitation period was clear and satisfactory. However, he fell into error in another respect. He directed the assessors in relation to each of these offences, five, six, seven and eight, that if they found only one of the particulars which occurred within the limitation period proved they could convict of the offence if they considered it could properly be termed conduct unbecoming the office and work of a clerk in Holy Orders. We are driven reluctantly to the conclusion that this was a misdirection in respect of each of these charges. The result is that it is impossible to be sure whether the assessors found only one of the particulars proved and convicted the appellant in respect of the one particular proved. Moreover the appellant does not know which or how many of the particulars were found to be proved against him by the assessors.

The chancellor is in the same position and when considering sentence does not know, for instance, whether he is sentencing the accused for unbecoming conduct which consisted of writing one rude letter, or six rude letters under charge five, or for indulging in one fit of temper in church or four fits of temper in church under charge seven. In future, if the articles contain a charge of 'unbecoming conduct' which consists of a series of acts specified in a number of particulars within the limitation period the chancellor should (a) ask the assessors to state which of the particulars they find proved and (b) direct the assessors that they cannot convict unless they find more than one of the particulars proved and moreover that in respect of the particulars which they find proved the accused had been found guilty of 'unbecoming conduct'.

We have now to consider whether, notwithstanding the misdirection, there has been any substantial miscarriage of justice. As regards the fifth charge we are not a left in any doubt. We have seen the letters which the appellant admits writing and we have read his evidence about them. We are satisfied that if the assessors had been properly directed they would have inevitably come to the same conclusion. We, therefore, dismiss the appeal against conviction on the fifth charge.

b As regards the sixth, seventh and eighth charges (on which there was a conflict of evidence on many issues of fact) we are not satisfied that if the assessors had been properly directed they would have inevitably come to the same conclusion. We, therefore, allow the appeal against conviction in respect of the sixth, seventh and eighth charges.

c Counsel for the appellant also contended (although he did not press his contention) that the conduct of the trial was irregular in that the chancellor declined to allow the assessors to put such questions to the appellant as they might wish, notwithstanding the application on that behalf by counsel for the appellant. None of the assessors had in fact asked the chancellor for leave to put a question. Counsel for the appellant had asked the chancellor to invite the assessors to put questions if they wished to do so, but the chancellor had refused. In our judgment there was no obligation on the chancellor to invite the assessors to put questions. If an assessor wishes to put a question, the chancellor has a discretion whether to put the question d himself if he thinks it is a proper one or allow the assessor to do so. In an assize court, the judge usually asks the juror to put his question in writing and if he considers it admissible and relevant the judge usually puts the question himself. We think this is a practice which should normally be followed by the chancellor. We hold that there is no substance in this case in the contention that the trial was irregular on this ground.

It remains to consider the censures pronounced by the chancellor. Section 49 of the Measure provides five different kinds of censure which may be pronounced on a person found guilty of an offence under the Measure. They vary in their severity from deprivation to rebuke.

f Deprivation is the most severe. It involves removal from any preferment which the person then holds and disqualification from holding any other preferment (except any preferment to which the bishop of the diocese shall appoint him). Moreover, by s 50 of the Measure when a censure of deprivation is pronounced on any priest or deacon the bishop of the diocese may by sentence without any further legal proceedings depose him from Holy Orders.

g When pronouncing censure, the chancellor explained his approach to the selection of the censure which he should impose as follows:

h 'When it comes to selecting the sentence or censure which I should impose in this case, I remind myself that it has long been the practice of the courts spiritual to pass sentence pro salute animae—for the good of the soul—and I give that a wider interpretation, and say that I think it is my duty to pass sentence pro salute animarum—for the good of souls, which includes both the [appellant], the convicted clerk himself, and the souls of those who were committed to his care. I am quite convinced that I should be failing in my duty if I did not do all that lies in my power to ensure that the convicted clerk and the cures where he was working part company now for ever. I know of no way in which I can ensure this except by the censure or sentence of deprivation.'

j It is clear that the chancellor considered it to be his duty to part the appellant and his cure for ever and the only way he could do that was to pronounce a censure of deprivation. In our judgment this was a wholly wrong approach. The paramount consideration in selecting the appropriate sentence for an offence under the Measure should be the gravity of the offence. Censure of deprivation should never be pronounced unless the gravity of the offence or of the totality of the offences of which the person has been convicted merit such sentence. It should never be pronounced in respect of an offence which does not merit such censure merely because it is highly desirable to part an incumbent from his parish and there is no other administrative method of removing him from his benefice. a

There is no indication that the chancellor after having made up his mind to do all that lay in his power to part the appellant from his cures for ever, addressed his mind to the gravity of each particular offence. Indeed, he pronounced the same sentence of deprivation in respect of each of the seven offences although they varied widely in their gravity. b

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that in selecting the appropriate censure, the chancellor as vicar general and official principal, exercising part of the cure of the bishop, should act in his pastoral capacity and not in his judicial capacity. Counsel for the respondent referred to earlier statutes in which censure was always pronounced by the bishop and particularly to s 6 of the Clergy Discipline Act 1892 which provided that when a clergyman was under that Act adjudged guilty of an offence regard should be had in considering the sentence to the interests of the ecclesiastical parish or place concerned and not to precedents of punishment. This Act was chiefly concerned with acts of immorality. Moreover it has been wholly repealed by the Measure. c

Counsel for the respondent also cited *Rice v Bishop of Oxford*⁶, a decision on the Benefices Act 1898 in which the Archbishop of Canterbury in pronouncing censure said: d

‘The interests of parishioners—that is to say, the religious well-being of the parish as a whole—ought to be, in all cases, the paramount consideration . . .’ e

That Act, however, is wholly different in its object and scope from the Measure. The preamble to the Measure is:

‘A Measure passed by The National Assembly of the Church of England to reform and reconstruct the system of ecclesiastical courts of the Church of England, to replace with new provisions the existing enactments relating to ecclesiastical discipline . . .’ f

Under s 28 of the Measure it is the duty of the chancellor if the accused is found guilty of an offence, to decide such censure, therefore, as is warranted by the Measure. We can find nothing in the Measure to support the contentions of counsel for the respondent. If these contentions mean that the chancellor in his pastoral capacity is entitled to and should pronounce sentence of deprivation in the interests of the parish in respect of an offence under this Measure or the totality of offences which does not merit this severe punishment, we are unable to accept these contentions. g

In *Combe v De la Bere*⁸ Lord Penzance said:

‘. . . it is not the particular character of an ecclesiastical offence which alone warrants the application of the censure [i.e. of deprivation], but the gravity of the offence in each particular case taken in connection with its attendant circumstances and carefully weighed in the estimation of the Court.’ h

We agree that if an offence or the totality of the offences by its gravity merits deprivation, the chancellor may in deciding whether to pronounce this sentence, properly take into consideration the interests of the parish together with the other relevant circumstances. j

As we have confirmed the conviction on the fifth offence only, we are concerned solely with the sentence of deprivation pronounced in respect of this offence. Censure of deprivation is wholly out of proportion to the gravity of this offence and we vary this censure by substituting a censure of rebuke.

Appeal allowed in part; censure varied.

LORD DENNING MR, MEGAW AND STEPHENSON LJJ

17th, 18th, 19th NOVEMBER 1971

Copyright – Fair dealing – Literary, dramatic and musical works – Fair dealing for purposes of criticism or review – Scope of defence – Not limited to criticism of literary style – Defence extending to criticism of doctrine or philosophy expounded in work – Work not published to world at large – Defence available where unpublished work has had wide circulation – Copyright Act 1956, s 6 (2).

Equity – Confidence – Breach of confidence – Defence – Public interest in publication – Scientology – Courses of instruction in cult of Scientology – Undertaking not to impart information acquired on course – Courses containing material of such a nature that desirable in public interest that information should be made public.

Injunction – Interlocutory – Principle governing grant – Copyright – Claim for infringement – Defence of fair dealing – Plaintiff having arguable case not sufficient to justify grant where defence of fair dealing raised.

H was the founder of the Church of Scientology of California and was the author of a number of books which expounded the doctrines of the cult of Scientology. He had also written numerous bulletins and letters on the subject which had been circulated to members of the cult. V, who had been a member of the Church of Scientology for many years, enrolled for an advanced course on Scientology which the cult's authorities regarded as confidential. They required V to sign an undertaking (a) to use the knowledge acquired on the course for Scientology purposes only, and (b) to refrain from divulging information received to those not entitled to receive it. V did not, however, complete the course. He became disillusioned with Scientology. The cult's authorities thought that he was actively seeking to suppress or damage Scientology, and so, in accordance with the cult's practice, they declared him to be a 'suppressive person' and to be in a condition of 'enemy'. The effect of this was that in the eyes of Scientologists V had no right to 'self, possessions or position' and any Scientologist could take any action against him with impunity. V left the organisation and wrote a book about Scientology, which was stated on the jacket to be 'The first ever investigation into the cult of Scientology by an ex-Scientologist of 14 years' service'. The book was highly critical of Scientology and contained many extracts from the books and other writings of H. H and the Church of Scientology brought an action against V claiming infringement of copyright and breach of confidence and sought an interlocutory injunction restraining publication.

Held – The plaintiffs were not entitled to an interlocutory injunction for the following reasons—

(i) V had shown that he might have a good defence of 'fair dealing' under s 6 (2)^a of the Copyright Act 1956; whether the use of extensive quotations from H's works constituted 'fair dealing' was a question to be decided by the tribunal of fact, and there was material on which the tribunal of fact could find that there was 'fair dealing'; further the defence of fair dealing covered criticism not only of a plaintiff's literary style but also of the doctrine or philosophy expounded in his works and extended not only to those of the plaintiff's works which had been published to the world at large but also to those which had been so widely circulated that it would be fair to subject them to public criticism (see p 1027 f to h, p 1028 a d and e, p 1031 d g and h and p 1033 f, post); dictum of Romer J in British Oxygen Co Ltd v Liquid Air Ltd [1925] Ch at 393 disapproved:

(ii) although V may have made use of information which he knew that the plaintiffs claimed to be confidential, there were, nevertheless, grounds for thinking that the courses of the Church of Scientology contained such dangerous material that it was in the public interest that it should be made known; furthermore (per Megaw LJ) there was evidence that the plaintiffs had been protecting their secrets by deplorable means, such as was evidenced by their code of ethics, and therefore did not come to the court with clean hands in seeking to protect those secrets by the equitable remedy of an injunction (see p 1028 j, p 1029 c and p 1033 d e and f, post); dictum of Lord Denning MR in Fraser v Evans [1969] 1 All ER at 11 applied;

(iii) the defences raised by V to the claims for breach of copyright and breach of confidence were such that V should be permitted to go ahead with publication; to justify the grant of an interlocutory injunction it was not sufficient that, having established a strong prima facie case that he owned the copyright, a plaintiff need only show that he had an arguable case that the defendant had infringed it or was about to infringe it; each case was to be decided on a basis of fairness, justice and common sense in relation to the whole of the issues of fact and law relevant to the particular case; V had reasonable defences to the plaintiffs' claims; if those defences were valid he was entitled to publish his book and the law would not intervene to suppress freedom of speech except when it was abused (see p 1029 g to p 1030 b and j to p 1031 a and p 1033 e and f, post); Donmar Productions Ltd v Bart [1967] 2 All ER 338 and Harman Pictures NV v Osborne [1967] 2 All ER 324 disapproved.

Per Megaw LJ. The fact that a quotation contains every single word of the work criticised or reviewed does not necessarily preclude a defendant from relying on the defence of fair dealing under s 6 (2) of the Copyright Act 1956 (see p 1031 e, post).

Interlocutory appeal

- This was an appeal by the defendants, Cyril Ronald Vosper and Neville Spearman Ltd, from the order of Kilner Brown J made on 4th October 1971, on the application of the plaintiffs, Lafayette Ronald Hubbard and the Church of Scientology of California, whereby it was ordered that the injunction granted on 9th September 1971 by Griffiths J on an ex parte application by the plaintiffs restraining the first defendant by himself, his servants or agents or howsoever otherwise and the second defendant by their officers, servants or agents or howsoever otherwise from distributing, disseminating, selling or parting with the book 'The Mind Benders' and further restraining
- d ing the first defendant by himself, his agents or servants from further imparting any information, the subject of confidence between the plaintiffs and the first defendant to any party whomsoever without the plaintiffs' express consent, be continued for a period not exceeding 28 days or further order. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.
- e Leonard Caplan QC and M Levene for the defendants.
Peter Pain QC and Alan Newman for the plaintiffs.

- LORD DENNING MR. On 9th September a book was published called 'The Mind Benders'. It was written by Mr Cyril Vosper, the first defendant, and published by Neville Spearman Ltd, the second defendant. It was very critical of the cult of Scientology. On the same day the Church of Scientology of California issued a writ. They went to the judge and obtained ex parte an interim injunction to restrain the publication of the book. Later on Mr Lafayette Ronald Hubbard was added as plaintiff. After hearing both sides, Kilner Brown J continued the injunction but, as the matter involved the public interest, he hoped it would be taken to appeal.
- f 'Scientology' is a word invented by Mr Hubbard himself. He has invented a lot of other words too which he has set out in a Dictionary of Scientology. He defines
- g it in this way:

'SCIENTOLOGY: An applied religious philosophy dealing with the study of knowledge, which, through the application of its technology can bring about desirable changes in the conditions of life.'

- h In addition to the dictionary, he has written many books about this philosophy or cult. They include 'Axioms and Logics', 'Introduction to Scientology Ethics', 'Scientology 8-80', 'Scientology 8-8008', and 'Scientology—A History of Man'. All of them contain a large number of his invented words. They cannot be understood by anyone who is not versed in the cult. In addition, Mr Hubbard has written numerous bulletins and letters which have been circulated to members of the cult.
- i These give many descriptions of the workings of Scientology.
- Mr Hubbard and his adherents occupy a big house near East Grinstead called Saint Hill Manor. They hold courses for those who wish to study Scientology and to acquire proficiency in it. Some of these courses, on their own admission, 'can be dangerous in untrained hands'.

Mr Vosper was a member of the Church of Scientology for 14 years. He worked at Saint Hill Manor as secretary, and such like. In 1967 he put his name down for a a course which the authorities regarded as confidential. It was called the Saint Hill Special Briefing Course. He paid a fee of £150 and signed an undertaking 'relating to higher levels of knowledge'. He undertook (a) to use this knowledge for Scientology purposes only; (b) to refrain from divulging level VI materials to those not entitled to receive them or to discuss them within the hearing of such persons. Mr Vosper did not, however, complete the course. He became disillusioned with Scientology. Those in authority thought that he was actively seeking to suppress or damage Scientology. So in September 1968 they declared him to be a 'suppressive person', which meant that he was considered 'fair game', and they declared him to be in a condition of 'enemy'. In order to understand what that means, you have to look at the books. It means that in the eyes of Scientologists, Mr Vosper had no right 'to self, possessions or position', and that any Scientologist could take any action against him with impunity.

c So Mr Vosper left Saint Hill Manor. He wrote 'The Mind Benders'. It said on the jacket that it was 'The first ever investigation into the cult of Scientology by an ex-Scientologist of 14 years' service'. It is this book of which the plaintiffs now seek to prevent publication. They do it on two grounds: first, infringement of copyright; secondly, breach of confidence.

1 Infringement of copyright

d Whatever one may think of Mr Hubbard's books, letters and bulletins, they are the subject of literary copyright. His name appears as author on every book, letter and bulletin. So he is presumed to be the owner of the copyright in them. In writing 'The Mind Benders' Mr Vosper has made free use of Mr Hubbard's books, letters and bulletins. He has taken very little from some, but from others he has taken very substantial parts. For instance, he has taken quite big extracts from the 'Introduction to Scientology Ethics', and put them into his book. He has also taken substantial parts of the letters and bulletins. The parts taken are so substantial that Mr Vosper will be guilty of infringement of copyright unless he can make good his defence. And his defence is that his use of them is fair dealing within s 6 (2) of the Copyright Act 1956. This provides:

f 'No fair dealing with literary, dramatic or musical work shall constitute an infringement of the copyright in the work if it is for purposes of criticism or review, whether of that work or of another work, and is accompanied by a sufficient acknowledgment.'

The last words of the section are satisfied. At the end of his book, Mr Vosper said: 'Criticisms are used from the following books by L Ron Hubbard'—setting them out.

g The question is, therefore, whether Mr Vosper's treatment of Mr Hubbard's books was a 'fair dealing' with them 'for the purposes of criticism or review'. There is very little in our law books to help on this. Some cases can be used to illustrate what is not 'fair dealing'. It is not fair dealing for a rival in the trade to take copyright material and use it for his own benefit. Such as when the Times published a letter on America by Rudyard Kipling. The St James Gazette took out half-a-dozen passages and published them as extracts. This was held to be an infringement: see *Walter v Steinkopff*¹. So also when the University of London published examination papers. The Tutorial Press took several of the papers and published them in their own publication for the use of students. It was held to be an infringement: see *University of London Press Ltd v University Tutorial Press Ltd*². Likewise when a band played 20 bars of 'Colonel Bogey'—to entertain hearers—it was not fair dealing: see *Hawkes & Son (London) Ltd v Paramount Film Service Ltd*³.

a In this case Mr Vosper has taken considerable extracts from Mr Hubbard's work and has commented freely on them. I will give some illustrations. On p 28 of Mr Vosper's book, he gives a quotation from Mr Hubbard's 'Axioms and Logics'. I will emphasise the words taken:

b 'Scientology Axiom One is the assumption upon which the rest of the subject stands. "Life is basically a static, [and this is further defined] a Life Static has no mass, no motion, no wavelength, no location in space or in time. It has the ability to postulate and to perceive."

'Hubbard has redefined in modern, scientific-sounding terms the ancient Hindu Vedanta concept of a soul or spirit that, whilst appearing to inhabit the physical universe is of a distinctly separate order.'

c Another illustration is on p 141 of Mr Vosper's book:

'Hubbard in his book "Introduction to Scientology Ethics, 1968" states: "A Suppressive Person or Group becomes 'Fair Game'. By Fair Game is meant, without right for self, possessions or position, and no Scientologist may be brought before a Committee of Evidence or punished for any action taken against a Suppressive Person or Group during the period that person or group is 'fair game'."

d 'Would a Scientologist who takes it into his head to murder a declared Suppressive Person be regarded by Scientologists as fully within his rights? That murder has not occurred as far as is known, is not to the credit of L. Ron Hubbard's Ethics but more to the credit of police and courts of the old-fashioned, repressive type.'

e Those illustrations enable me to state the conflicting arguments. Counsel for the plaintiffs says that what Mr Vosper has done is to take important parts of Mr Hubbard's book and explain them and amplify them. That, he says, is not fair dealing. Counsel for the defendants says that Mr Vosper has, indeed, taken important parts of Mr Hubbard's book, but he has done it so so as to expose them to the public, and to criticise them and to condemn them. That, he says, is fair dealing.

f It is impossible to define what is 'fair dealing'. It must be a question of degree. You must consider first the number and extent of the quotations and extracts. Are they altogether too many and too long to be fair? Then you must consider the use made of them. If they are used as a basis for comment, criticism or review, that may be a fair dealing. If they are used to convey the same information as the author, for a rival purpose, that may be unfair. Next, you must consider the proportions.

g To take long extracts and attach short comments may be unfair. But, short extracts and long comments may be fair. Other considerations may come to mind also. But, after all is said and done, it must be a matter of impression. As with fair comment in the law of libel, so with fair dealing in the law of copyright. The tribunal of fact must decide. In the present case, there is material on which the tribunal of fact could find this to be fair dealing.

h Counsel for the plaintiffs took, however, another point. He said that the defence of 'fair dealing' only avails a defendant when he is criticising or reviewing the plaintiff's literary work. It does not avail a defendant, said counsel, when he is criticising or reviewing the doctrine or philosophy underlying the plaintiff's work. In support of this proposition, counsel for the plaintiffs relied on the words of Romer J in *British Oxygen Co Ltd v Liquid Air Ltd*⁴:

i 'I am inclined to agree with [counsel for the plaintiffs] that, in this proviso [as to "fair dealing"] the word "criticism" means a criticism of a work as such.'

But, when you refer back to counsel for the plaintiffs' arguments, you will see that all he means is that the criticism must be a criticism of the plaintiff's work, and not of the plaintiff's conduct. I do not think that this proviso is confined as narrowly as counsel for the plaintiffs submits. A literary work consists not only of the literary style, but also of the thoughts underlying it, as expressed in the words. Under the defence of 'fair dealing' both can be criticised. Mr Vosper is entitled to criticise not only the literary style, but also the doctrine or philosophy of Mr Hubbard as expounded in the books. a

Counsel for the plaintiffs took yet another point. This was on the bulletins and letters. These, he said, were not published to the world at large, but only to a limited number of people and, in particular, to those who took classes in Scientology. He said that, whilst it might be 'fair dealing' to criticise the books, it was not 'fair dealing' to take extracts from these bulletins and letters and criticise them. He quoted again the words of Romer J in the British Oxygen case⁵: b '... it would be manifestly unfair that an unpublished literary work should, without the consent of the author, be the subject of public criticism, review or newspaper summary. Any such dealing with an unpublished literary work would not, therefore, in my opinion, be a "fair dealing" with the work.'

I am afraid I cannot go all the way with those words of Romer J. Although a literary work may not be published to the world at large, it may, however, be circulated to such a wide circle that it is 'fair dealing' to criticise it publicly in a newspaper, or elsewhere. This happens sometimes when a company sends a circular to the whole body of shareholders. It may be of such general interest that it is quite legitimate for a newspaper to make quotations from it, and to criticise them—or review them—without thereby being guilty of infringing copyright. The newspaper must, of course, be careful not to fall foul of the law of libel. So also here these bulletins and letters may have been so widely circulated that it was perfectly 'fair dealing' for Mr Vosper to take extracts from them and criticise them in his book. d

It seems to me, therefore, that Mr Vosper may have a good defence of 'fair dealing' to raise at the trial. e

2 Breach of confidence f

Counsel for the plaintiffs claimed that Mr Vosper in the book was using information obtained in confidence and should be restrained from so doing. During the first part of the argument, I felt there was very little evidence to show that Mr Vosper was using any confidential information. But counsel pointed out that, in 'The Mind Benders' there is a passage from which it can be inferred. In the book, Mr Vosper says at p 119: g

'Owing to the restimulative nature of the materials comprising the Solo-Audit and Clearing Courses, there is a heavy security clamp on it. When a student enrolls on these courses, he signs a declaration not to divulge to any non-Clear [that is one of Mr Hubbard's invented words meaning someone who is not a Scientologist] any of the data which is given to him. Insanity, severe illness and possible death is foretold for anyone who is not yet ready for it, who happens to even glance at the Solo-Audit or Clearing Course worksheets.'

In view of this, I think there is ground for thinking that Mr Vosper may have used information knowing that Mr Hubbard claimed it to be confidential. Nevertheless, he may have a good answer. We have had several cases in this court recently about confidential information. The law will, in a proper case, intervene to restrain a defendant from revealing information or other material obtained in confidence, such as trade secrets, and the like. This depends on the broad principle of equity that he who has received information in confidence shall not take unfair advantage i a of it: see *Seager v Copydex*⁶. But the information must be such that it is a proper subject for protection. As I said in *Fraser v Evans*⁷:

'There are some things which may be required to be disclosed in the public interest, in which event no confidence can be prayed in aid to keep them secret.'

b In this case counsel for the defendants has drawn our attention to the nature of these courses for which confidence is claimed. The plaintiffs themselves say that: 'the material contained in these courses can be dangerous in untrained hands'. Counsel for the defendants took us through the books and said that they indicate medical quackeries of a sort which may be dangerous if practised behind closed doors. They are so dangerous, he said that it is in the public interest that these goings-on should be made known. The closed doors should be opened for all to see. We cannot decide on it today, as this is only an interlocutory application. But, I think that, even on what we have heard so far, there is good ground for thinking c that these courses contain such dangerous material that it is in the public interest that it should be made known.

d The judge fully appreciated that Mr Vosper might well have good defences; but, nevertheless, he granted an injunction to prevent him publishing the book. The reason was because of two decisions by judges of first instance. *Donmar Productions Ltd v Bart*⁸ decided in 1964 but reported in 1967 and *Harman Pictures N V v Osborne*⁹. Those cases do seem to suggest that, in an action for infringement of copyright (and also it would appear in any other action for the infringement of a right) when a plaintiff seeks an interlocutory injunction, he has to do two things: first, e he must establish a strong prima facie case that he owns the copyright or other right; but, secondly, having done that, he need only show an arguable case that the defendant has infringed it or is about to infringe it. In the words of Goff J in Harman's case¹⁰, the plaintiff—

f 'does not have to show that he is likely to be successful or more likely to be so than the defendant, but only that he has a case reasonably capable of succeeding.'

We are told that practitioners have been treating these cases as deciding that, if the plaintiff has an arguable case, an injunction should be granted so that the status quo may be maintained. The judge was so told in the present case, and that is why he granted the injunction.

g I would like to say at once that I cannot accept the propositions stated in those two cases. In considering whether to grant an interlocutory injunction, the right course for a judge is to look at the whole case. He must have regard not only to the strength of the claim but also to the strength of the defence, and then decide what is best to be done. Sometimes it is best to grant an injunction so as to maintain the status quo until the trial. At other times it is best not to impose a restraint on the defendant but leave him free to go ahead. For instance, in *Fraser v Evans*¹¹, although the plaintiff h owned the copyright, we did not grant an injunction, because the defendant might have a defence of fair dealing. The remedy by interlocutory injunction is so useful that it should be kept flexible and discretionary. It must not be made the subject of strict rules.

i But here, although Mr Hubbard owns the copyright, nevertheless, Mr Vosper

has a defence of fair dealing, and, although Mr Hubbard may possess confidential information, nevertheless, Mr Vosper has a defence of public interest. These defences are such that he should be permitted to go ahead with the publication. If what he says is true, it is only right that the dangers of this cult should be exposed. We never restrain a defendant in a libel action who says he is going to justify. So in a copy-right action, we ought not to restrain a defendant who has a reasonable defence of fair dealing. Nor in an action for breach of confidence, if the defendant has a reasonable defence of public interest. The reason is because the defendant, if he is right, is entitled to publish it; and the law will not intervene to suppress freedom of speech except when it is abused.

I would, therefore, allow this appeal and remove the injunction.

MEGAW LJ. I agree. There are a few matters to which I wish to add some observations. First, I wish to say something with regard to the matter with which Lord Denning MR has dealt at the end of his judgment, in relation to interlocutory injunctions. I very much doubt whether the passage in Halsbury's Laws of England¹², cited by Ungood-Thomas J in his judgment in *Donmar Productions Ltd v Bart*¹³, was intended to state as a general proposition that different standards of proof are to be applied when the court considers, first, the question whether the plaintiff has a right, and, secondly, the question whether, if the plaintiff does have the right, that right has been infringed. It is true that in certain special cases one can approach the matter in that way. Suppose, for example, the plaintiff's claim for an interlocutory injunction is based on his contentions that he is the owner of a piece of land and that the defendant has trespassed on it. If the defendant does not dispute that the piece of land belongs to the plaintiff, then it may, in some cases, require only the slightest evidence on the part of the plaintiff of the fact that the defendant has gone on that land to entitle the plaintiff to an injunction. The defendant in those circumstances, if he has a defence at all, has a defence to the action only on the basis: 'I have not gone on that land.' In those circumstances there is no reason why an interlocutory injunction should not normally be granted against him if there is some evidence that he has in fact done so. But, to change the example, if the plaintiff's case is: 'You, the defendant, trespassed on my land', and the defendant's defence is 'True, you are the owner of that land, but you gave me a licence to walk over that land'—then, although the plaintiff's right in one sense is not disputed, in that he is the owner of the land, the question, and the whole question is: is there a licence? It may be that the onus of establishing that is on the defendant; but this is not a question of onus of proof. In such circumstances in my judgment it could not rightly be said that, once the plaintiff has established that he is the owner of the land, it only needs a mere possibility of success in connection with the assertion of the absence of a licence to entitle him as of right to an interlocutory injunction. It must be looked at on the whole of the case; the existence of the right and of any defences that are asserted in relation to the admitted existence of that right. In addition, one has to take into account the evidence of the alleged breach, the facts relating to the alleged breach, and even then there is no firm and invariable criterion which can be laid down on the basis of the prospects of success in the action because frequently one has to consider also the balance of convenience, as well as the status quo. One can readily imagine a case in which the plaintiff appears to have a 75 per cent chance of establishing his claim, but in which the damage to the defendant from the granting of the interlocutory injunction, if the 25 per cent defence proved to be right, would be so great compared with the triviality of the damage to the plaintiff if he is refused the injunction, that an interlocutory injunction should be refused. To my mind it is impossible and unworkable to lay a down different standards in relation to different issues which fall to be considered in an application for an interlocutory injunction. Each case must be decided on a basis of fairness, justice and common sense in relation to the whole of the issues of fact and law which are relevant to the particular case.

b Now I come to the first of the main issues in the present appeal; that is the question of the copyright. The principal submission by counsel for the plaintiffs, related to the construction of s 6 (2) of the Copyright Act 1956. As I understand his argument, it was that criticism 'whether of that work of or another work' (words used in that subsection) cannot be taken to apply to criticism which is criticism of something other than the work itself. That may be an acceptable proposition, but it is only an acceptable proposition when one has defined with reasonable clarity what is meant by 'criticism of something other than the work itself'. Counsel for the plaintiffs did not suggest that 'criticism' in this subsection was confined to what I would call literary criticism; that is to say, criticism of the style—the literary style—of the work in question. But if it is not confined to that, it must surely then cover criticism of the ideas, the thoughts, expressed by the work in question—the subject-matter of the work. What is the subject-matter of the works which are relevant in this appeal? The subject-matter of each of them is some facet of the doctrine, the practice, the training, and the code of ethics or discipline of this organisation, the Church of Scientology of California. To my mind there can be no doubt that the criticism contained in the book, 'The Mind Benders', is, on a fair reading, a criticism of that subject-matter by reference, in part at least, to its exposition in those works. It is in that context that the quotations from those works are used.

e It is then said that the passages which have been taken from these various works—in particular, from the one of them described as 'Introduction to Scientology Ethics'—are so substantial, quantitatively so great in relation to the respective works from which the citations are taken, that they fall outside the scope of 'fair dealing'. To my mind this question of substantiality is a question of degree. It may well be that it does not prevent the quotation of a work from being within the fair dealing subsection even though the quotation may be of every single word of the work. Let me give an example. Suppose that there is on a tombstone in a churchyard an epitaph consisting of a dozen or of 20 words. A parishioner of the church thinks that this sort of epitaph is out of place on a tombstone. He writes a letter to the parish magazine setting out the words of the epitaph. Could it be suggested that that citation is so substantial, consisting of 100 per cent of the 'work' in question, that it must necessarily be outside the scope of the fair dealing provision? To my mind it could not validly be so suggested. In this present case, having considered what we have been shown of the passages taken from the various works in relation (because I think this test must also be applied) to the nature and purpose of the individual quotations, I find myself unable to say that the plaintiffs have made out a case that the quotations are so substantial that this does not fall within the fair dealing provision. To my mind the plaintiffs have failed to establish to the required degree, in relation to an application of this sort and in relation to all the other factors that have to be taken into account, that they ought to be granted an interlocutory injunction in relation to the alleged breach of copyright.

h I turn to the question of confidentiality. Lord Denning MR has referred to one passage which occurred in some of the documents put before us in relation to 'fair game'. I think it is right, in fairness to the plaintiffs, that it should be said that it would seem that that particular provision has disappeared from the latest, or 1970, edition of the book 'Introduction to Scientology Ethics'. It is right in these circumstances that something should be said about the history of that provision. So far as the documents before us are concerned, it appears chronologically for the first time in what is described as the 'Hubbard Communications Office Policy Letter of March 1, 1965', under the heading, 'Justice. Suppressive Acts. Suppression of Scientology and Scientologists. The Fair Game Law'. That document defined 'Potential Trouble Sources'. They were persons who were active in Scientology, or persons known as 'preclears', who remained 'connected to a person or group that is a suppressive person or group'. A 'suppressive person or group' is then defined in the document as 'one that actively seeks to suppress or damage Scientology or a Scientologist by Suppressive Acts'. 'Suppressive acts' are then defined as 'acts calculated to impede or destroy Scientology or a Scientologist and which are listed at length in this policy letter'. I should refer to some of these 'suppressive acts', the carrying out of which turns a person, for the purpose of this document, into a 'suppressive person or group'. 'Suppressive acts' include 'proposing, advising or voting for legislation or ordinances, rules or laws directed toward the Suppression of Scientology . . .' So that if a voter in this country were to have the temerity to cast a vote in a Parliamentary election for a candidate who had indicated that he was minded to propose legislation which would 'suppress' Scientology, that person would be guilty in the eyes of this organisation of having committed 'a suppressive act'. Again, 'testifying hostilely before state or public enquiries into Scientology to suppress it'; 'reporting or threatening to report Scientology or Scientologists to civil authorities in an effort to suppress Scientology or Scientologists from practising or receiving standard Scientology'; 'bringing civil suit against any Scientology organisation or Scientologist including the non-payment of bills or failure to refund without first calling the matter to the attention of the Chairman . . .'; 'writing anti-Scientology letters to the press or giving anti-Scientology or anti-Scientologist evidence to the press'; 'testifying as a hostile witness against Scientology in public'. If words mean anything, that meant that in the eyes of this organisation a person became 'a suppressive person'—'a suppressive person' guilty of a suppressive act—if, however truthful, however much compelled by process of law, he should give evidence in a court of law hostile to the organisation of Scientology. And this is the organisation which is seeking to have its documents treated as confidential by the order of the court. It went on to include among 'suppressive acts': '1st degree murder, arson, disintegration of persons or belongings not guilty of suppressive acts'. There can be no doubt that the last five words relate to the preceding word 'persons'. What does that mean? That it was, in the eyes of this organisation in 1965, 'a suppressive act' to be guilty of 'first degree murder', provided that the person you murdered had not been guilty of suppressive acts. The implication is obvious. Yet another 'suppressive act' is, 'delivering up the person of a Scientologist without defense or protest to the demands of civil or criminal law'.

In the 1968 edition of 'Scientology Ethics' those provisions remain substantially the same, and they continue at that date to include the 'fair game' provisions which I have mentioned as having been included in the 'Justice policy' document of 1965. In those years it was provided that suppressive persons or groups became 'Fair Game':

' . . . by Fair Game is meant, without rights for self, possessions or position, and no Scientologist may be brought before a Committee of Evidence or punished for any action taken against a Suppressive Person or Group during the period that person or group is "fair game" '.

Well, it may be that there is or was some explanation of that general provision, as of the related 'first degree murder' provision, which will take away from it the meaning which to any ordinary person it would carry; namely, that here was an organisation which had laid down a criminal code of its own and by that criminal code it treated and required its adherents to treat, persons as outlaws deprived of any protection or sanction so far as the Scientological organisation was concerned if they had been guilty of 'suppressive acts', and no Scientologist was to be condemned, under the ethical code of Scientology, for any action—I repeat any action—which he might take against such 'fair game'. It is right that this should be mentioned: in the latest edition of the Scientology Ethics, which appears to have been published in the year 1970, the provisions as to 'fair game' have now been removed from its code of ethics, a Most of the matters which I have mentioned earlier, as being examples of 'suppressive acts' still remain as 'suppressive acts'. They come under the heading: 'High Crimes (Suppressive Acts)'; but the provisions as to 'fair game' have disappeared from the code. One other respect in which 'suppressive acts' have changed since the original policy document is this; the last five words have disappeared from that extraordinary example of a 'suppressive act': '1st degree murder, arson, disintegration of persons or belongings not guilty of suppressive acts'. So that the Scientology organisation has now changed its provisions, from those that previously prevailed, in such a way that 'first degree murder' may now apparently be regarded as a crime within this organisation, even though the murderer is a Scientologist, and even though the victim is one who, in the eyes of the organisation, has committed a 'suppressive act', such as having written a letter to a newspaper adversely criticising Scientology.

c Having regard to the matters which we have seen and, bearing in mind counsel for the plaintiffs' observations that he came to this court unprepared to deal with matters of that sort, to my mind it is here sufficiently clear that, whatever explanations may be given, assuming that the words used in relation to 'suppressive acts' mean what they on their face appear to mean, counsel for the defendants is more than abundantly justified in his proposition that there is here evidence that the plaintiffs are or have been protecting their secrets by deplorable means such as is evidenced by this code of ethics; and, that being so, they do not come with clean hands to this court in asking the court to protect those secrets by the equitable remedy of an injunction.

e For the reasons which I have given and for the reasons which have been given by Lord Denning MR, I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

f STEPHENSON LJ. I entirely agree. I would only add one further consideration in favour of refusing the plaintiffs the injunction which the judge granted. Damages appear to me to be an adequate remedy for any breach of copyright or confidence which may be proved at the trial; indeed any damage which the publication of Mr Vosper's book may cause to the plaintiffs is less likely to result from what he quotes from their literature or discloses from their material than from the criticism which Mr Vosper makes of them and of their cult of Scientology as a whole.

Appeal allowed; injunction removed. Leave to appeal refused.

LORD WIDGERY CJ, MELFORD STEVENSON AND CANTLEY JJ

2nd FEBRUARY 1972

Compensation – Criminal injuries – Criminal Injuries Compensation Board – Entitlement to compensation – Victim and offender living together as members of the same family – No right to compensation – Husband and wife living in same house – Sleeping in different rooms – Wife not cooking or cleaning for husband – Wife attacked by husband – Whether living together – Whether wife entitled to compensation for injuries – Compensation for Victims of Crimes of Violence Scheme 1964 (1969 revision), para 5 (a).

The applicant and her husband lived with their children in two council flats knocked into one. Relations between them had not been good for a long time. Proceedings for persistent cruelty were taken against the husband and after a time he went to prison. On his release he returned to the matrimonial home. The applicant was reluctant to see him, being frightened for her own safety. She slept in a bedroom with one of her two daughters while he slept on a sofa in the living room; there were no sexual relations between them and the applicant did not clean or cook for him. Some days later they quarrelled and the husband criminally attacked the applicant. She claimed compensation under the Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme^a. The Criminal Injuries Compensation Board refused her claim finding that, since she and her husband were living together with the children as members of the same family in the same house at the time when she was attacked, she was not entitled to make a claim by virtue of para 7^b of the scheme. On an application for certiorari to quash the board's decision, the applicant contended that, applying the principles of divorce law, she and her husband were living apart at the relevant time.

Held – The phrase 'living together . . . as members of the same family' in para 7 of the scheme should be given its ordinary, natural meaning and should not be made to conform with matrimonial law; the question whether a husband and wife were living together as members of the same family would normally be a question of fact; in the present case the question was one of fact and there was no justification for alleging that the board had erred in law; accordingly the application would be refused (see p 1036 e to h, post).

a of certiorari to bring up and quash a decision of the respondents, the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, made on 9th March 1971 whereby they refused her claim for compensation in respect of injuries received by her on 23rd May 1970 and inflicted by her husband. The applicant also applied for an order of mandamus directing the respondent board to award her compensation for her injuries. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Widgery CJ.

Gordon Slynn for the respondent board.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. In these proceedings counsel moves on behalf of the applicant, Mrs Rita Marjorie Staten, for an order of certiorari to remove into this court and quash a decision of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board made on 9th March 1971, whereby compensation to the applicant in respect of injuries received by her on 23rd May 1970 was refused under para 7 of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme, in that it was said that the applicant and her husband who inflicted the injuries were living together at the time as members of the same family.

The findings of the respondent board in this case, so far as the facts of this matter are concerned, were these. The applicant was the wife of the person who inflicted the relevant injuries on her. They had a number of children. Their domestic base, as it were, consisted of two council flats which had been knocked into one. They thus had two bedrooms, two kitchens, two bathrooms and a living room. Relations between the applicant and her husband had not been good for a long time. Proceedings for persistent cruelty were taken, and after a time the applicant's husband went to prison. He came back from prison on 12th May 1970 and, as the respondent board find, returned to live in the matrimonial home. He stayed there for 11 days which took him up to the occasion when this injury was inflicted on his wife, giving rise to the present proceedings.

The applicant was reluctant to see her husband come home on 12th May 1970. She said she was terrified for her own safety, and the evidence before the respondent board was to the effect that following 12th May the applicant slept in a bedroom with one of her two daughters whilst her husband slept on a sofa in the adjoining living room. There were no sexual relations between the husband and the applicant and she did not clean or cook for him. The respondent board saw no sufficient reason to disbelieve that evidence and accepted it.

So we have here a situation where as a matter of fact the husband and wife and the children were living in one home, but with the degree of discord between the husband and wife which is reflected in the paragraph which I have just read. They slept in different rooms and the wife did not cook or clean for the husband. But that in many other respects this was a family living as a family is apparent from the next paragraph in the respondent board's decision, because the respondent board deal in some detail with the incident giving rise to the injury suffered by the applicant on 23rd May 1970. They find that the husband had gone out and he had been drinking heavily, he came back, there was an argument in the matrimonial home relative to one of the children, the argument continued in the living room for some time until the wife eventually withdrew herself to her bedroom, and the husband followed her to the bedroom and attacked her, giving rise to the present claim.

That is the factual background on which the case is to be determined, and the short issue which we have to decide is whether in those circumstances the applicant, who undoubtedly suffered injuries in consequence of a criminal attack on her by her husband, is deprived of any claim for compensation under the terms of para 7 of the scheme which reads as follows:

'Where the victim who suffered injuries and the offender who inflicted them were living together at the time as members of the same family no compensation will be payable . . .'

The question therefore ultimately for the respondent board to determine is whether the applicant was deprived of her right to compensation because it was the husband who inflicted the damage and they were living together at the time as members of the same family.

Counsel for the applicant has approached this case by first of all examining the phrase 'living together'. He says that here one should ignore the children and other factors of that kind and examine the relationship between husband and wife. He says that if one examines that relationship it is such that in the divorce law it might well be held, or I think he would say it would be held, that they were living apart or that one has deserted the other. He says that if the conclusion by applying the principles of divorce law is that they are not living together in that sense, then one need look no further and questions of the 'same family' do not in those circumstances arise. He invites us really to treat this case as though there were no children involved, as though the husband and the wife were the only persons living in the flat, and to approach it on the lines which the divorce law approaches what is, to my mind, a wholly different question, namely whether one party in a marriage has deserted another.

Counsel on behalf of the respondent board maintains the correctness of the board's decision refusing compensation, and says that here when one looks at the decision as a whole—and I have read most of it—it is abundantly clear that there was one family occupying this accommodation. He says that at the very least it is clear that there was evidence which the respondent board could adopt to reach that conclusion, but I think he would choose to go even further and to say that the conclusion that there was one family here, living together, is really inescapable. The applicant cannot succeed unless she shows an error of law on the face of the order or that there was no evidence to support it, and counsel for the applicant has in my judgment found it quite impossible to define the law on this subject in such a way as to show that what is involved here is an error of law. In my judgment, this is a new code intended to be set out in simple language and a phrase such as 'living together as members of the same family' ought to be given its ordinary straightforward normal meaning. I deprecate the complication which would result if the whole of the mass of learning in the divorce laws were introduced into this phrase so as to make it conform with the matrimonial law itself. I think the court should look at these words and give them their ordinary sensible meaning, and very often the question of whether the parties are living together as members of the same family will be a pure question of fact. Indeed I think this is a pure question of fact in this case. I am quite satisfied there is no possible justification for saying that the respondent board erred in law. Indeed, so far as it is of any value to add it, I think they were entirely right and I would accordingly refuse the application.

Higgins v Bernard

LORD WIDGERY CJ, MELFORD STEVENSON AND FORBES JJ

7th FEBRUARY 1972

Road traffic – Motorway – Restrictions on stopping – Vehicle stopping on verge – Stopping by reason of any accident, illness or other emergency – Meaning of emergency – Sudden occurrence not essential – Necessity of showing that danger alleged to constitute emergency not foreseeable before proceeding on to motorway – Driver overcome by drowsiness – Motorways Traffic Regulations 1959 (SI 1959 No 1147), regs 7 (2), 9.

The respondent was discovered by a police officer sitting in a motor car which was stationary on the hard shoulder of the slip road of the M62 motorway, about 50 yards from the main carriageway and about a quarter of a mile from the junction of the entrance to the slip road from the A672 road. The respondent's explanation was that he had had little sleep the previous night and that a feeling of drowsiness had come over him. Being concerned for his safety, he had been looking for a place to stop and rest but had not been able to find a suitable place on the A672. Having entered the slip road he decided that he was not fit to drive the ten miles to the next turn-off from the motorway and so pulled aside and stopped for a rest. He was charged with stopping on the verge of a motorway contrary to reg 9^a of the Motorways Traffic Regulations 1959 but was acquitted by the justices on the ground that he had stopped by reason of an emergency within reg 7 (2)^b of the 1959 regulations. On appeal, Held – (i) Although an element of suddenness was not essential for the existence of an emergency, it was necessary to show (a) that the driver had proceeded on to the motorway in circumstances in which the danger alleged to constitute the emergency was not apparent to him at all, and (b) that thereafter something, not necessarily some sudden exigency, had supervened which rendered it unsafe for him to proceed to the next turn-off point (see p 1040 g and h and p 1041 b, post).

(ii) It followed that the respondent could not plead an emergency as a ground for stopping on the verge since his drowsiness, and hence the potential danger of continuing to drive, was clearly apparent to him before he embarked on the motorway at all; accordingly the appeal would be allowed (see p 1040 j to p 1041 a and b, post).

Case referred to in judgment

Larchbank (Owners) v British Petrol (Owners), The Larchbank [1943] AC 299, 168 LT 161, 112 LJ P 10, 42 Digest (Repl) 833, 6093.

This was an appeal by way of case stated by justices for the West Riding of the county of York acting in and for the petty sessional division of Calder in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Halifax.

a Regulation 9 is set out at p 1039 j, post

b Regulation 7 (2), so far as material, is set out at p 1040 a and b, post

On 20th May 1971 an information was preferred by the appellant, John Paton Higgins, against the respondent, Arthur Bernard, charging that he on 27th April 1971 at Windy Hill in the West Riding of the county of York did cause a certain motor vehicle to stop on the verge of the M62 motorway otherwise than in accordance with paras (2) and (3) of reg 7 of the Motorways Traffic Regulations 1959, contrary to reg 9 of the regulations and s 13 (4) of the Road Traffic (Regulation) Act 1967. The justices heard and adjudicated on the information, which they dismissed, on 11th August 1971. a

The justices found the following facts proved or admitted. (a) At 5.45 pm on 27th April 1971 Pc James Barry Coulson of the West Yorkshire Police was on duty in a police patrol car, when he saw a Ford Escort motor car stationary on the verge of the slip road of the M62 motorway about 50 yards from the main motorway carriageway and about one quarter of a mile from the junction of the entrance slip road and the A672 Oldham Road. (b) The respondent was awake and sitting in the driving seat of the vehicle and was alone. When asked why he had stopped, the respondent said, 'For a rest'. The officer pointed out that he could have stopped a quarter of a mile away and the respondent replied, 'I didn't feel too bad then'. The offence of stopping on a motorway otherwise than in accordance with the regulations was pointed out to the respondent, who said, 'I appreciate it's not an emergency but I felt I had to have a rest'. When told that he would be reported with a view to prosecution, the respondent said, 'You are right, I didn't feel like driving to Huddersfield'. (c) The respondent then drove off in an orderly manner. (d) The respondent gave evidence on oath and stated that for the two days prior to 27th April 1971 he had covered a lot of mileage and had covered 110 miles the previous day. He said that he had been to visit his mother and went to bed at 12.30 a.m. or 12.40 a.m. on 27th April and arose at 6.30 a.m. He said that he had travelled this section of the motorway on the outward journey and was returning from Cheshire. He said that for the last mile of the journey he was beginning to feel extremely drowsy and was concerned for his safety and was looking for a place to stop. He said that the A672 was covered for the most part by single white lines and he could not find room to park. He stated that he was unaware that he was so close to the motorway and, having reached the motorway, he decided that it was foolish to stop on the approach road because of traffic and decided to stop on the slip road near the motorway. He stated that he was drowsy, that it was dangerous to continue driving and that he could have fallen asleep at the wheel. He stated that he believed that the only possible intersection was ten miles further on at the end of the motorway. (e) Having stopped, the respondent wound his window down, opened his door and got as much air as he could without getting out of the car. He then wound his window halfway up and closed his eyes, having in mind to stop for five or ten minutes when the police constable arrived. c

On behalf of the respondent it was submitted, having regard to the facts stated in (d) above, that the respondent had stopped by reason of an emergency within the meaning of reg 7 (1) (b) of the 1959 regulations. The attention of the justices was drawn to an article entitled 'Motorway Emergency' which had appeared in the Justice of the Peace and Local Government Review^c. On behalf of the respondent it was submitted that the facts of the case referred to in the article were on all fours with the facts of the case before us. h

On behalf of the appellant it was submitted that in the circumstances disclosed no such emergency existed within the meaning of reg 7 (1) (b) of the 1959 regulations.

The justices were of opinion that, having regard to their findings, in particular having accepted that the respondent was beginning to feel drowsy and was concerned for his safety, there was a likelihood that the respondent would fall asleep at the wheel and he was correct to attempt to avert this danger by stopping on the verge of i

- a the motorway, and that, therefore, the circumstances constituted an emergency within the meaning of reg 7 (1) (b) of the 1959 regulations.

R A R Stroyan for the appellant.

N E Beddard for the respondent.

- b LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by case stated by justices for the West Riding of Yorkshire in respect of their adjudication as a magistrates' court sitting at Halifax on 11th August 1971. On that date they dismissed an information laid by the appellant against the respondent alleging that the respondent on 27th April 1971 at an address given did cause a certain motor vehicle, namely a motor car, to stop on the verge of a motorway, namely the M62 motorway, otherwise than in accordance with paras (2) and (3) of reg 7 of the Motorways Traffic Regulations 1951¹.

- c The facts of the case were briefly these. On the day in question at about 5.45 p.m., a police officer on duty in a police patrol car saw the respondent sitting in a Ford Escort motor car which was stationary on what is described in the case as the verge of the slip road of the M62 motorway about 50 yards from the main motorway carriage-way and about a quarter of a mile from the junction of the entrance to the slip road and the A672 Oldham Road. That, we are told, can be expressed in another way in d this form, by saying that he had entered the slip road leading from the A672 on to the motorway, he had proceeded about a quarter of a mile down the slip road, and when still 50 yards short of the main motorway itself he had pulled off on to what is commonly called the hard shoulder or the verge, and stopped his car there.

- e When the police officer approached, the respondent was awake, sitting in the driving seat. He was asked why he had stopped. He replied, 'For a rest'. The officer pointed out that if he wanted to stop for a rest, he could have stopped a quarter of a mile earlier without impinging on the motorway or its regulations at all, to which the respondent replied: 'I didn't feel too bad then'. The officer pointed out that stopping on the motorway was only permitted in an emergency, and the respondent said: 'I appreciate it's not an emergency but I felt I had to have a rest'.

- f When he gave his own account of the circumstances in evidence, he said that he had driven on the previous day, he had been on a visit to his mother, and went to bed at about 12.30 a.m., but got up again at 6.30 a.m. the same day. We do not know much about his movements after his rising that morning, but in regard to the last part of his journey, he said in evidence that for the last mile of the journey he was beginning to feel extremely drowsy and was concerned for his safety and was looking for a g place to stop. It is clear to my mind that that shows the consciousness that he was drowsy and the consciousness that it was necessary for him to stop was something which came to him before he left the ordinary A class road and before he turned on to the motorway slip road at all. He said there were difficulties about parking on the A672, and having got into the slip road he realised he was drowsy and that he was not fit to drive for the ten miles which lay between him and the next turn-off from the h motorway. Accordingly he pulled aside and had a rest with the door of the car open.

The justices clearly treated him as a witness of truth; they accepted his account, and they decided as a matter of law that what he had done was within the exempting words of the Motorway Regulations as being in an emergency. The question for us is whether that was a correct view in law of the terms of those regulations.

Regulation 9 of the Motorways Traffic Regulations 1951¹ provides:

- i 'No vehicle shall be driven or moved or stop or remain at rest on any verge except in accordance with paragraphs (2) and (3) of Regulation 7.'

'Where it is necessary for a vehicle which is being driven on a carriageway to be stopped while it is on a motorway [and I go to (b):] by reason of any accident, illness or other emergency; or (c) to permit any person carried in or on the vehicle to recover or move any object which has fallen on a motorway; or (d) to permit any person carried in or on the vehicle to give help which is required by any other person in any of the circumstances specified in the foregoing provisions of this paragraph, the vehicle shall, as soon and in so far as is reasonably practicable, be driven or moved off the carriageway on to, and may stop and remain at rest on, the verge which lies on the left-hand or near side of that vehicle ...'

So that the exemption permitting the respondent to do what he did, if there was an emergency at all, requires as its essentials that the vehicle shall have been driven on a carriageway of a motorway, and that it shall thereafter become necessary for the vehicle to stop by reason of an emergency.

The justices, and I have every sympathy with them, thought that those requirements had been satisfied here. There is no previous authority, we are told, on the meaning of the word 'emergency' in this context. One comes to the dictionary and the first meaning given in the Shorter Oxford Dictionary is: 'The sudden or unexpected occurrence of a state of things'; the alternative is 'a sudden occurrence'.

Too much stress, however, in my judgment, must not be attached to the word 'sudden' because in a somewhat different context, although a context which I find valuable, the meaning of an emergency has been considered by the House of Lords. The case is *Larchbank v British Petrol*² and I take the extract from the speech of Lord Atkin. He said³:

"'Emergency' can be used to describe a state of things which is not the result of a sudden occurrence. A condition of things causing a reasonable apprehension of the near approach of danger would, I think, constitute an emergency. The gradual approach of a hostile invader might well at some time or other constitute an emergency. So might the position arising from the presence of a large hostile force encamped near the frontier and only awaiting favourable conditions for an advance.'

I am indebted to Lord Atkin for that guidance, and perhaps for preventing me from falling into the error of thinking that an element of suddenness is essential for the existence of an emergency in the present legislation. I think that it is not, but in my judgment in this context an essential which has to be shown is that the driver in question was on the carriageway of the motorway and got himself on to the carriageway in circumstances in which the danger alleged to constitute an emergency was not apparent to him at all. In other words, that he got on to the carriageway at a time when, as far as he could see, it was safe and lawful for him to proceed along the motorway, at all events to the next turn-off point which might appear. It having been shown that he got himself on to the carriageway in that state of affairs, the next thing to show is that something supervened, not necessarily some sudden exigency at the moment, but something intervened which rendered it unsafe for him to proceed to the next turn-off point. Given those facts it seems to me that a man should be able to plead emergency as a ground for stopping on the verge.

The only remaining question is whether this motorist qualified on the test so described, and in my judgment I think he clearly did not, because if one thing is clear in this case it is that the drowsiness and the potential danger if he continued to drive was clearly apparent to this driver before he embarked on the motorway at all. Accordingly, it cannot be said that he got on to the carriageway of the motorway in circumstances in which the danger was not apparent, and that the danger thereafter supervened. The danger was clear to him before he elected to go on to the motorway, and he cannot plead its recognition as an emergency for present purposes. I would allow the appeal and send the case back with a direction to convict.

COURT OF APPEAL, CRIMINAL DIVISION

LORD WIDGERY CJ, PHILLIMORE LJ AND LAWSON J

13th, 21st JANUARY 1972

Road traffic – Driving while unfit through drink – Driving with blood-alcohol proportion above prescribed limit – Specimen of blood or urine – Analyst's certificate as to proportion of alcohol in specimen – Certificate as evidence of matters certified – Admissibility – Failure to serve copy on accused not less than seven days before hearing or trial – Waiver of objection to admission by accused – Failure by accused to object to admission before close of prosecution case constituting waiver – Road Traffic Act 1962, s 2 (2).

On a charge of driving etc under the influence of drink or drugs or with a blood-alcohol concentration above the prescribed limit, the requirement of s 2 (2)^a of the Road Traffic Act 1962 that an analyst's certificate of the proportion of alcohol in the defendant's blood must be served on the defendant not less than seven days before the hearing or trial, may be waived by the defendant, and will in fact have been waived if the defendant makes no objection to the evidence to which that certificate relates prior to the close of the prosecution's case. If at the hearing the defendant wishes to complain that he is ignorant of what is alleged in the certificate to be the alcohol content of his specimen or that he has had an insufficient opportunity to challenge the contents of the certificate, he must object to the admission of the contents of the certificate before it is put in evidence (see p 1046 b to e, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Jack Banks against his conviction at Lancashire County Quarter Sessions sitting at Preston on 2nd July 1971 before his Honour Judge Lawton, deputy chairman, and a jury of the offence of being in charge of a motor vehicle on a road having consumed alcohol in such quantity that the proportion thereof in his blood exceeded the prescribed limit at the time he provided the specimen contrary to the Road Safety Act 1967, s 1. The appellant was found guilty, fined £25 and disqualified from driving for 12 months. He appealed by leave of the single judge. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

21st January. LAWSON J read the following judgment of the court. Jack Banks, the appellant, a man aged 38, appeals by leave of the single judge against his conviction at Lancashire County Quarter Sessions on 2nd July 1971 on his trial on indictment for the offence of being in charge of a motor vehicle on a road having consumed alcohol in such quantity that the proportion thereof in his blood, as ascertained from a laboratory test for which he subsequently provided a specimen under s 3 of the Road Safety Act 1967, exceeded the prescribed limit (i.e. 80 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood) at the time he provided the specimen. For this offence the appellant was fined £25, his licence was endorsed and he was disqualified for 12 months by the deputy chairman, his Honour Judge Lawton.

The grounds of the appellant's appeal are that the learned judge was wrong in rejecting the defence submission that there was no evidence of service of the analyst's certificate on the appellant as required by s 2 (2) of the Road Traffic Act 1962 and s 32 (1) of and Sch 1, para 21, to the Road Safety Act 1967.

Section 2 (2) of the Road Traffic Act 1962 provides:

'For the purposes of any such proceedings, a certificate purporting to be signed by an authorised analyst, and certifying the proportion of alcohol or any drug found in a specimen identified by the certificate and, in the case of a specimen not being a specimen of blood, the proportion of alcohol or of that drug in the blood which corresponds to the proportion found in the specimen, shall be evidence of the matters so certified and of the qualification of the analyst: Provided that the foregoing provision shall not apply to a certificate tendered on behalf of the prosecution unless a copy has been served on the accused not less than seven days before the hearing or trial, nor if the accused, not less than three days before the hearing or trial, or within such further time as the court may in special circumstances allow, has served notice on the prosecutor requiring the attendance at the hearing or trial of the person by whom the certificate was signed.'

When enacted this subsection was related to offences under s 6 of the Road Traffic Act 1960, namely, driving or attempting to drive or being in charge of a motor vehicle on a road or other public place when unfit to drive through drink or drugs. When the new offences of driving, attempting to drive, or being in charge of a motor vehicle having consumed in excess of the prescribed limit were enacted by s 1 of the Road Safety Act 1967, s 2 (2) of the 1962 Act was applied to them by s 32 (1) of and Sch 1, para 21, to the 1967 Act. Section 32 (1) provides:

'The enactments mentioned in Schedule 1 to this Act shall have effect subject to the amendments therein specified, being minor amendments and amendments consequential on the foregoing provisions of this Act.'

Schedule 1, para 21, provides:

'A copy of a certificate required by the proviso to section 2 (2) to be served on the accused or of a notice required by that proviso to be served on the prosecutor may either be personally served on the accused or the prosecutor (as the case may be) or sent to him by registered post or the recorded delivery service.'

It is necessary briefly to set out the history of this case. The appellant was committed for trial on written statements with exhibits which were tendered to the magistrates' court under s 1 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967. These included the statement of Pc Robinson which referred to and exhibited a copy of the analyst's certificate which showed that the analysis of the sample of blood provided by the appellant under s 3 of the 1967 Act contained 229 milligrammes of alcohol in 100 millilitres of blood—thus 149 milligrammes in excess of the prescribed limit.

The written statements and exhibits on which the appellant was committed for trial were supplied to him or his advisers prior to his trial in accordance with r 3 of the Magistrates' Courts Rules 1968¹ which provides as follows:

'This Rule applies to committal proceedings where the accused is represented by counsel or a solicitor and where the court has been informed that all the evidence for the prosecution is in the form of written statements copies of which have been given to the accused.'

On his arraignment the appellant pleaded not guilty to the charge on which he was indicted. The evidence led for the Crown at the trial included that of Pc Robinson who put the analyst's certificate in evidence. No objection was taken at that point, or until after the close of the Crown's evidence that the requirements of the proviso to s 2 (2) of the 1962 Act as to prior service of a copy of the certificate had not been complied with. At the close of the Crown's case it was submitted on behalf of the appellant that there was no case for him to answer since the requisite service of a copy of the analyst's certificate had not been proved.

After hearing argument, in the course of which no authority was cited, the deputy chairman ruled that the fact that the analyst's certificate was annexed as an exhibit to the statements tendered under s 1 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 constituted service for the purposes of the proviso in question. Before so holding the deputy chairman referred to the fact that the certificate had in fact been put in without objection.

The defence submission having been overruled the defence did not seek to challenge the findings set out in the analyst's certificate but proceeded in an endeavour to defeat the prosecution on two grounds: (i) that it had not been proved to the requisite degree that the appellant was in charge of the motor vehicle on the occasion in question; and (ii) that there was no likelihood of the appellant driving the vehicle on that occasion because it was undriveable owing to a mechanical fault. The deputy chairman summed up the case to the jury dealing with these points and no objection is taken to his summing-up. The jury convicted the appellant.

It is clear that the Crown did not lead any evidence at the trial to show that the requirements of the proviso to s 2 (2) of the 1962 Act, as applied to the appellant's offence under s 1 (2) of the Road Safety Act 1967 by s 32 (1) of and Sch 1, para 21, to that Act, relating to prior service of a copy of the analyst's certificate, had been complied with. It is equally clear that counsel for the appellant at no time before the close of the Crown's case had indicated or made any objection to the production of that certificate in evidence. The question which the court had to decide is whether, in these circumstances, the deputy chairman's ruling was correct.

where the defendant who had been charged with driving under the influence of drink under s 6 of the Road Traffic Act 1960 contended, on appeal, that an analyst's certificate as to the alcohol content of his urine had been wrongly admitted by the trial judge, on the ground that no offer had been made to him that he should be supplied with a part of the specimen taken of his urine until after he had provided that specimen. The relevant provision of the Road Traffic Act 1962 in this respect (namely s 2 (5)) requires, as the Court of Criminal Appeal held, that the offer to supply a part of the specimen must be made at or very shortly before the request for the specimen is made. The Court of Criminal Appeal held that failure in the respect mentioned did not make the evidence of the analyst inadmissible as a matter of law but required the trial judge to exclude that evidence in the exercise of his discretion unless he were satisfied that no prejudice was likely to result to the defendant by such failure. In the course of the court's judgment it was said that the practice with regard to disputes under s 2 (5) of the 1962 Act should be modelled on that which applies when the voluntary character of a confession is challenged. Counsel for the defence should inform counsel for the prosecution of his objection so that the disputed evidence is not mentioned in the opening and the judge will hear evidence on disputed facts and give his ruling in the absence of the jury, taking into account the discretion to which the court referred.

In our judgment the decision in Mitten's case³ that the trial judge has a discretion to admit an analyst's certificate, or his evidence, notwithstanding a failure to comply with the requirements of s 2 (5) as to the offer of a sample of the specimen requested, cannot be applied to a failure to comply with the requirements of s 1 (2) as to prior service of a copy of the analyst's certificate. That subsection is designed to allow evidence to be admitted which would otherwise, on the grounds of hearsay, be excluded, provided that the conditions of the proviso are satisfied. If those conditions are not adhered to, then prima facie, the analyst's certificate, as distinct from his oral evidence, is not evidence of the truth of its contents.

Furthermore, this court takes the view that there is no room in a case such as the present to apply the principle of presumed regularity. There are, of course, many cases where this presumption has been successfully relied on in cases under the road traffic legislation where the defendant has sought to raise, in the course of his defence, a question as to the validity of a breath test administered to him under s 3 of the Road Safety Act 1967 (see *Sayer v Johnson*⁴, *Gill v Forster*⁵, and *Cooper v Rowlands*⁶). But this line of cases is distinguishable from the present one, as the court is here concerned with a statutory condition for the admission of hearsay evidence.

In the course of the argument on the appellant's submission the deputy chairman referred to cases in which the prosecution had failed to prove service of notice of intended prosecution. But this, in our view, is unhelpful having regard to s 241 (3) of the Road Traffic Act 1960 which provides that such notice is to be presumed unless the contrary is proved by the defence.

In the course of the argument in the present appeal, the court drew counsel's attention to *Grimble & Co v Preston*⁷, a decision of the Divisional Court on a case stated where magistrates had convicted the appellants of an offence under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1899 (now replaced by the 1955 Act). The relevant ground of appeal was that the summons served on them was not accompanied by a copy of the analyst's certificate obtained on behalf of the prosecution. This requirement was imposed by s 19 (2) of the 1899 Act and is reproduced in s 108 (3) of the 1955 Act—which Act, unlike that of 1899, also contains a provision in s 110 to the effect that the production in proceedings of an analyst's certificate in the prescribed form (that a is the form prescribed by s 92 (5) of the 1955 Act) shall be sufficient evidence of its contents unless the other party to the proceedings requires the analyst to be called. In that case no objection was taken by the defendants that the summons served had not been accompanied by the analyst's certificate, until after the close of the prosecution's case. The analyst had in fact given oral evidence as to his findings, as the law then required. The magistrates overruled the objection and proceeded to convict on the evidence offered, including that of the analyst. The Divisional Court dismissed the appeal. In the course of their judgments the judges of the court dealt with the service point. Darling J said⁸:

c 'As to the second point I do not think that the objection that a copy of the analyst's certificate was not served with the summons goes to the jurisdiction of the justices. The service of the certificate is a matter of procedure, and if the objection that it had not been served was insisted upon, the court could not cure the defect, but the defect is one which the party entitled to have the certificate served upon him could waive either by words or conduct. In this case it is plain that the solicitor for the appellants waived the objection by his conduct.'

d 'As to the second point, I think that the provision that a copy of the analyst's certificate must be served with the summons cannot be got over if the person entitled to have the certificate served upon him takes the objection in the proper way. The defect cannot be cured by amendment or adjournment because however often the case may be adjourned the certificate can no longer be served with the summons. All that could be done would be to withdraw the summons and if possible commence fresh proceedings. The provision merely prescribes a formality which is to accompany the service of the summons instituting the proceedings. If the defendant chooses to appear and by words or conduct declares that though he has not had the certificate served on him with the summons he prefers to go on with his defence, I think that he may do so and the jurisdiction of the justices is not affected by the omission of the formality, which f is prescribed for the protection of the defendant and which he has power to waive. The question remains whether what the appellants did amounted to a waiver. They appeared by an advocate, who did not take the objection at the commencement of the hearing but cross-examined the witnesses for the prosecution and did not take the objection until he was called upon to open his own case. In the case of *Batt v. Mattinson*¹⁰, it was pointed out, and I agree, though I g should be bound by it even if I did not agree, that the provision of the statute is imperative. In that case the objection was taken when the defendant appeared before the court and before the case was gone into, and no question of waiver such as we are considering arose, and the decision merely was that if the defendant takes the objection it cannot be got over. That case did not lay down a rule that the objection could not be waived.'

h Atkin J said¹¹:

i 'On the second point I also agree. The objection that the analyst's certificate was not served with the summons did not go to the jurisdiction of the justices. It was founded upon an informality which could not be cured by amendment (see *Batt v. Mattinson*¹²), and which was a breach of a condition precedent to the appellants being brought before the justices who had cognizance of the offence. In those circumstances a person, who knows of the existence of the defect and does not take the objection at the commencement of the hearing but prefers to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution and defers the objection until the case for the prosecution has been completed can waive the objection just as any other condition precedent can be waived. It has been suggested to us that even after a formal refusal to take the objection and after evidence has been called for the defence and the magistrates have decided to convict, the objection can still be taken. But I do not agree with that contention.'

*Grimble's case*¹³ thus supports the view that a requirement that an analyst's certificate on which the prosecution proposes to rely should be served on the defendant not less than seven days before the hearing or trial, may be the subject of waiver and will in fact be waived if the defendant prior to the close of the prosecution's case makes no objection to the evidence to which that certificate relates. We think it important to observe that the object of the proviso to s 2 (2) of the 1962 Act is twofold, first, to let the defendant know precisely what is alleged as to the alcohol content of his specimen and secondly, to provide a sufficient opportunity to enable him, by requiring the analyst to be called, to challenge the relevant allegation. It is clear that if the defendant's complaint at the hearing is that he is ignorant of that aspect of the prosecution's case, or that he has had an insufficient opportunity to challenge the contents of the certificate, he is under an obligation to object to the admission of the contents of the certificate before it is put in evidence. If he does not do so there is no indication that he has been prejudiced by the prosecutor's failure to satisfy the requirements of the proviso to s 2 (2); and the absence of such prejudice is revealed in the present case.

It should be borne in mind that it was not disputed that the alcohol content of the appellant's specimen was some 200 per cent in excess of the prescribed level, and counsel for the applicant frankly concedes that his point is devoid of factual merits. It would seem ludicrous in such a case that an accused should be permitted to wait until after the analyst's certificate had been put in evidence and the case for the prosecution closed and then allowed to take a wholly unmeritorious point, hitherto kept up his sleeve, in order to secure an acquittal. Thus, equally frankly, this court is glad to have reached the decision that, for the reasons given, the appellant's appeal should be dismissed. The saving of time, expense and confusion which will result in future cases in no way endangers the rights of an accused charged with an offence under s 6 of the 1960 Act, or one under the Road Safety Act 1967, who wishes to challenge the contents of the analyst's certificate, or prejudices the fair trial of such offences where, for practical reasons, including the volume of these offences and the limited number of qualified analysts, the prosecution desires to rely on the contents of analysts' certificates, which are in fact rarely challenged. In the exceptional case of such a challenge, the accused person remains, in our view, amply protected by the law.

NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COURT

SIR JOHN DONALDSON P, MR J H ARKELL AND MR H BRIGGS

13th, 17th DECEMBER 1971

Employment – Period of continuous employment – Transfer of trade, business or undertaking – Change of employers consequent on sale of factory premises – Sale including neither transfer of goodwill nor restrictions on trading by vendors – Vendors transferring business elsewhere – Employees continuing to be engaged in same type of work at factory under new employers – ‘Business’ to be equated with production activity carried on and production unit situated at factory — ‘Business’ not referring to commercial activity — Production unit left intact at factory by vendors – Sale constituting a transfer of business – Contracts of Employment Act 1963, Sch 1, para 10 (2).

C Ltd were the owners and occupiers of an engineering factory in Derbyshire engaged mainly in the manufacture of large diesel engines. In 1965 they sold the factory together with certain property, plant, machinery and equipment to P B Ltd and transferred their own business to Manchester. The sale did not include a transfer of the goodwill or business name nor did it include any restrictions on trading by C Ltd. P B Ltd, who intended to use the factory and equipment for their own engineering business, wished to attract into it as many as possible of C Ltd's employees. In the result all but one of the employees ceased working for C Ltd on Saturday, 31st July 1965, and entered the employment of P B Ltd on the following Monday, their terms and conditions of employment remaining the same as they had been when they worked for C Ltd. As the result of an agreement between C Ltd and P B Ltd that P B Ltd would complete a number of C Ltd's diesel engines at the factory the employees were, for a period of several months, engaged on the same work as they had been doing for C Ltd; work which was specifically that of P B Ltd was gradually introduced as that of C Ltd was completed. W and S, who had worked first for C Ltd and then for P B Ltd for an aggregate period of more than 20 years, were dismissed for redundancy by P B Ltd in May 1971. W and S claimed redundancy payments under the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 on the basis of over 20 years' continuous service with C Ltd and P B Ltd. The Industrial Tribunal came to the conclusion that, although there were factors pointing both ways, the sale of the factory to P B Ltd had none of the hallmarks of the transfer of a business, e.g. a sale of goodwill and restrictions on trading by the vendor, and that it was impossible to say that there had been a transfer of a business, within para 10 (2)^a of Sch 1 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963, so as to preserve the employees' continuity of employment since, following the sale of the factory, C Ltd continued to carry on their business elsewhere; consequently the tribunal held that the employees were only entitled to redundancy payments calculated on the basis of the period from August 1965 when they started to work for P B Ltd. On appeal,

Held – The sale of the factory to P B Ltd constituted a transfer of a business for the purposes of para 10 (2) of Sch 1 to the 1963 Act because—

(i) paragraph 10 (2) was not concerned with the sale of buildings or stock in trade or both, but with the transfer of ownership of a trade, business or undertaking in the sense of the whole working environment of the employees; the expression 'business' in para 10 (2) was to be equated not with the commercial activity in which C Ltd were formerly engaged in their Derbyshire factory but with the production activity carried on and the production unit situated there (see p 1054 b and c and p 1055 d and e, post);

^a Paragraph 10 (2) is set out at p 1049 c, post

(ii) on the evidence, nothing following the sale by C Ltd of their factory had affected the employees in their daily lives; the employees had continued to work as engineers; nothing had happened which was inconsistent with C Ltd having left a production unit behind them in Derbyshire and having formed a new one elsewhere (see p 1054 e and p 1055 a, post).

Per Curiam. In the context of the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 and of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 there is no reason why an employee should be concerned with, and still less prejudiced by, changes in the ownership of the business or undertaking in which he is working (see p 1053 h, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by Alfred Woodhouse and Moss Staton ('the employees') from a decision of the industrial tribunal (chairman J M Coulson Esq) sitting at Nottingham on 27th August 1971 that the employees were not entitled to any further sums by way of redundancy payment from their former employers, Peter Brotherhood Ltd. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

Peter Pain QC and L H C Lait for the employees.

Raymond Kidwell QC and P N Legh-Jones for the employers.

17th December. SIR JOHN DONALDSON P read the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal from the industrial tribunal sitting in Nottingham which decided by a majority that the employees were not entitled to any further sums by way of redundancy payment. Both employees were dismissed by reason of redundancy within the meaning of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 in May 1971 and both claimed payments on the basis of over 20 years' service. The respondent employers have admitted liability for payments based on service since 1965, but dispute any further liability. They submit, and the tribunal by a majority held, that there was a break in the continuity of the employees' employment when, in August 1965, the employers took over the factory at Sandiacre near Nottingham in which the employees had worked for many years.

Section 1 (1) of the Redundancy Payments Act 1965 provides:

'(1) Where on or after the appointed day an employee who has been continuously employed for the requisite period—(a) is dismissed by his employer by reason of redundancy . . . then, subject to the following provisions of this Part of this Act, the employer shall be liable to pay to him a sum (in this Act referred a to as a "redundancy payment") calculated in accordance with Schedule 1 to this Act.'

Schedule 1, para 1, provides:

b '(1) The amount of a redundancy payment to which an employee is entitled in any case shall, subject to the following provisions of this Schedule, be calculated by reference to the period, ending with the relevant date, during which he has been continuously employed; and for the purposes of this Schedule that period shall be computed in accordance with Schedule 1 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 . . .'

c The relevant provision of Sch 1 to the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 (hereinafter called 'the code') is para 10 (2) which provides:

d 'If a trade or business or an undertaking (whether or not it be an undertaking established by or under an Act of Parliament) is transferred from one person to another, the period of employment of an employee in the trade or business or an undertaking at the time of the transfer shall count as a period of employment with the transferee, and the transfer shall not break the continuity of the period of employment.'

The background facts of this dispute were found by the Tribunal in the following passages from their written reasons:

e '5. . . . [Crossley Premier Engines Ltd ('Crossleys')] owned and occupied a factory at Sandiacre in Derbyshire, very close to the Nottingham boundary, where, as engineers, they were mainly engaged in the manufacture of large diesel engines. In the Summer of 1965 they sold that factory and adjoining property together with much but not all of the plant, machinery, equipment, fixtures and fittings which it contained to the [employers] whose headquarters is at Peterborough . . . The [employers] who intended to use the factory and the purchased equipment in their engineering business wished to attract into their employment as many as possible of Crossleys employees and, with that in mind, all or most of those employees were, in or about July 1965, addressed by representatives of the [employers] in the presence of representatives of Crossleys management at a specially called meeting in the works canteen. No record was kept so it is not possible to know exactly what was said at the meeting but the gist of it was that the [employers] hoped that Crossleys employees would come into their employment, that their pay and conditions would be much the same if not better and, as an inducement, "all the service they had at the works" would count towards their entitlements under a sick pay scheme operated by the [employers] and towards any eventual retirement pension that might be due to them.

h '6. All except one employee decided to come into the [employers'] employment. As a result they ceased working for Crossleys on Friday or Saturday the 30th or 31st July 1965 and, on the following Monday, the 2nd August, they became employees of the [employers] . . . From the 2nd August 1965 both the [appellant employees] remained employed by the [employers] until their eventual dismissal for redundancy in May 1971.

j '7. Although the [employers] wished eventually to turn the factory over to the manufacture of such things as spinning machines for synthetic fibres, compressors and steam turbines there were, at the time of their entry into occupation of the factory, four or five large diesel engines, the property of Crossleys, which still remained to be finished. As a result the [employers] agreed to complete these engines for Crossleys using certain plant and equipment which the latter had not sold to the [employers] but had left behind in the factory for this purpose. Work on these engines was not completed until about February 1966

when they were consigned to Crossleys instructions and accounts were rendered to them by the [employers] for the work expended on them. The plant and equipment left behind by Crossleys for use on these engines was then returned to them at Manchester. It is thus clear that, in the period immediately following the entry into possession of the factory, the employees were all employed on the same work as they had been before; work which was specifically [the employers'] work was being gradually introduced as the work for Crossleys was completed.'

The tribunal had earlier directed themselves in reliance on the judgment of Widgery J in *Kenmir Ltd v Frizzell*¹ that—

'In deciding whether a transaction amounted to the transfer of a business, regard must be had to its substance rather than its form, and consideration must be given to the whole of the circumstances, weighing the factors which point in one direction against those which point in another. In the end, the vital consideration is whether the effect of the transaction was to put the transferee in possession of a going concern, the activities of which he could carry on without interruption.'

'8. There are undoubtedly factors which point towards a transfer of the type envisaged by Paragraph 10 (2) and others which point the other way. A summary of those which we consider to be particularly relevant, starting with those in favour of such a transfer but not set out in any order of relative significance, is as follows:—(a) Although Crossleys, as we understand it, was mainly concerned with the manufacture of large diesel engines, whereas these were not products normally manufactured by the [employers], they were both carrying on the business of engineers, requiring much the same plant and equipment and much the same skills in their employees. (b) To the employees who continued to work at Sandiacre, such as the [appellant employees], there were very few outward signs of change. On Monday 2nd August they returned to the same work on which they had been engaged the previous week; largely due of course [to the need to complete manufacture of the diesel engines to which reference has already been made]. When that work ended they still, however, continued to work on the same machines as they had worked on before the sale, doing very similar types of work. (c) The pension, holiday and sickness schemes took account of service with Crossleys. This has already been referred to. (d) Virtually the whole labour force transferred, almost automatically, to work for the [employers], there being no formal dismissal of them by Crossleys. (e) The purchase of the factory and much of the plant and machinery put the [employers] in possession of assets which could be and were put immediately into production without any break. (f) It seems the case that by selling the factory and much of its contents as an equipped engineering factory, Crossleys got a higher price than would have been obtained by selling off the assets separately.'

'9. Factors suggesting no transfer within Paragraph 10 (2) are as follows:—(a) There was no sale or transfer of goodwill or business name. (b) There was no restriction on competition by Crossleys. (c) There was no transfer of customers or of the benefits of contracts with 3rd parties. (d) There was no provision with regard to any debts or liabilities of Crossleys. (e) [The sale agreement] makes no mention of a transfer of a business and seems on the face of it, to be concerned solely with the sale of assets. (f) That after the sale of the factory, Crossleys transferred their business activities to Manchester and ever since have carried on a business there as engineers, manufacturing heavy diesel engines.'

a Commenting on these factors the tribunal said:

'10. . . . None of the obvious hall marks of the transfer of a business seemed to be present, such as a sale of goodwill or a restriction on trading by the vendor. On the other hand the tribunal was impressed in particular by the transfer of almost the entire labour force and by the fact that after the 2nd August they were almost all engaged on exactly the same work as they had been engaged on for Crossleys. The tribunal felt that it was so much a question of fact depending on our view of the individual circumstances that very little guidance, except in a general way, could be derived from most of the reported cases.'

The dissenting member of the tribunal was of opinion that—

c 'the real effect of the transaction was . . . to put the [employers] in possession of a going concern which they could, if they wished, carry on without interruption. A "going concern" was in his view, formed by the factory, the equipment and the labour and [he] was of the opinion that there was still a transfer of a business in a broad sense, even though the actual business activities engaged in by [Crossleys] were transferred by them to Manchester.'

d The view of the majority emerges in the following paragraph of the reasons:

e '12. The other two members of the tribunal, although they had the greatest sympathy for the [appellant employees], felt obliged to take a different view. They felt it was really impossible to conclude that there had been a transfer of a business when the business carried on by Crossleys was, after the sale of their Sandiacre factory, carried on by them elsewhere. They took the view that Crossleys business as manufacturing engineers was in no way taken over by the [employers]. All that the [employers] did was to do work, as sub-contractors to Crossleys, on certain engines which it was uneconomic to move from the premises at their then current stage of manufacture and, when that work was finished, the equipment and plant which was needed for further manufacture of such engines and which had been loaned to the [employers] for the purpose, was returned to Crossleys.'

Appeals to the High Court were, and appeals to this court are, limited to questions of law (see s 114 of the Industrial Relations Act 1971). Accordingly it is not for this court to interfere merely because it is possible that if it had heard the evidence it might have agreed with the dissenting member. However, in the light of the excellent arguments which have been addressed to this court by counsel for the employees, and by counsel for the employers, we are satisfied that the real point of the appeal turns on the construction of the words 'If a trade or business or an undertaking . . . is transferred' in para 10 (2) of the code. Counsel for the employers submits that the commercial element in a business is all-important and that, while it is not necessary that the goodwill shall have been transferred expressly, any failure by the transferee to acquire that goodwill is fatal to a contention that there has been a transfer within the meaning of the paragraph. Counsel for the employees, on the other hand, submits that what matters is the productive unit in which the employee was employed. If that unit is transferred as a going concern there is a transfer within the meaning of the paragraph, whatever may happen to the transferor's goodwill. Although we do not think that the members of the tribunal analysed the matter in quite this way, no doubt because they did not have the benefit of the very full argument which we have heard, we consider that this in essence represents the division of opinion between the majority and the minority and that this difference is as to a question of law.

j Paragraph 10 (2) of the code has been considered by the Court of Session in H A

*Rencoule (Joiners and Shopfitters) Ltd v Hunt*², by the Divisional Court in *G D Ault (Isle of Wight) Ltd v Gregory*³, *Kenmir Ltd v Frizzell*⁴ and *Huggins v A & J Gordon (Aveley) Ltd*⁵ and by the Court of Appeal in *Lloyd v Brassey*⁶. None of these authorities is conclusive of the problem with which we are confronted.

Ault's case³ shows that there can be a transfer of part of a business including the goodwill attaching to that part without break in the continuity of service, if what is transferred is a separate and self-contained part. In the present case if a part was transferred, it was a separate and self-contained part and nothing turns on this aspect.

In Rencoule's case², the parties expressly agreed that the purchaser was not purchasing the business and should have no right to use the old firm name. The Court of Session, however, held that there was in fact a transfer of the goodwill of the business. As the Lord President (Lord Clyde) put it⁷:

'... the transfer of the work in progress coupled with the obligation to introduce the purchasers to customers of Mr Fraser involved a transfer of the goodwill of his business. The whole operation necessarily meant a smooth and unbroken continuity between what was happening before and after the transfer.'

In Kenmir's case⁴ goodwill was not expressly included, but the sale covered the benefit of trade agreements and the use of trade names and the vendors covenanted not to set up in competition in the area. In the circumstances it was clear that goodwill was in effect being transferred. However the court did consider the importance of the presence or absence of an express transfer of goodwill in general terms in the following passage⁸:

'... counsel for the [employers] contends that there can be no transfer of a business unless the transaction includes an assignment of the goodwill. An assignment of goodwill may be ineffective in itself, and is normally accompanied by a sale of the business premises, stock-in-trade and the like, but it is contended that a transaction which excludes the transfer of goodwill is deficient in the vital element which can make the subject-matter of the transfer a "business". If this argument is correct, it might provide a very simple solution to the problem in this case, but we think that it would be surprising in the context of this legislation if the presence or absence of a transfer of goodwill were conclusive. Schedule 1 to the Act of 1963 is concerned with continuity of employment, and uses the phrase "transfer of a business" to describe a situation in which a change of employer should not be regarded as a break in the continuity of the employees' engagements. If a business has no goodwill because it is at a low ebb, or because it sells all its production to an associated company, the factory premises might be sold and all the activities of production transferred to the new owner without interruption; yet, if counsel's argument is right the employees' accrued rights under the Acts of 1963 and 1965 would be lost unless the transfer included a formal and empty phrase purporting to include goodwill.'

'In deciding whether a transaction amounted to the transfer of a business, regard must be had to its substance rather than its form, and consideration must be given to the whole of the circumstances, weighing the factors which point in a one direction against those which point in another. In the end, the vital consideration is whether the effect of the transaction was to put the transferee in possession of a going concern, the activities of which he could carry on without interruption.'

This is the passage in the judgment which has been approved by the Court of Appeal in *Lloyd v Brassey*¹⁰ and applied in other cases. The judgment in Kenmir's¹¹ case continued:

b 'Many factors may be relevant to this decision though few will be conclusive in themselves. Thus, if the new employer carries on business in the same manner as before, this will point to the existence of a transfer, but the converse is not necessarily true, because a transfer may be complete even though the transferee does not choose to avail himself of all the rights which he acquires thereunder. Similarly, an express assignment of goodwill is strong evidence of a transfer of the business, but the absence of such an assignment is not conclusive if the transferee has effectively deprived himself of the power to compete. The absence of an assignment of premises, stock-in-trade or outstanding contracts will likewise not be conclusive, if the particular circumstances of the transferee nevertheless enable him to carry on substantially the same business as before.'

c In *Huggins v A & J Gordon (Aveley) Ltd*¹² the Divisional Court was in the unusual position of hearing an appeal on a question of fact and deciding, by consent of the parties, between mutually inconsistent decisions of industrial tribunals. It applied the test of 'whether the effect of the transaction was to put the transferee in possession of a going concern the activities of which he could carry on without interruption'. The court held that there was a transfer, a factor which weighed heavily in reaching this decision being what had been described by counsel as 'the automatic transfer of the staff'. As Lord Widgery CJ said¹³:

d 'It was somewhat remarkable, and it can fairly be described as automatic. They all came back on Monday, they all settled down to their jobs, they all went ahead as though nothing had happened, and if one asks oneself the question which was asked in some of the other cases: is this the same business in different hands, I would have thought that almost anyone looking at the superficial signs at any rate would have said: yes, of course, the business is going on exactly as before although in different hands.'

e In *Lloyd v Brassey*¹⁴, the Court of Appeal affirmed that there need be no sale of goodwill as such, but on the facts of that case, which concerned a farm, a sale of the land and buildings automatically involved a transfer of the goodwill.

f In our judgment it is of the first importance to remember the context in which para 10 (2) of the code falls to be construed. The Redundancy Payments Act 1965 is concerned with payments related to continuity of work for an employer. Likewise the Contracts of Employment Act 1963 is concerned with minimum periods of notice required to terminate employment, again related to continuity of work for an employer. In this context there is no reason why an employee should be concerned with, and still less prejudiced by, changes in the ownership of the business or undertaking in which he works. Whether or not he is aware of them—and he may not be—he has little chance of exercising any control over them. Consistently with this approach, Parliament has decreed that a change of employer by Act of Parliament (para 10 (3) of the code), or by operation of law on the death of an employer (para

10 (4) of the code), or consequent on a change in the identity of partners in an employing firm or of employing personal representatives or trustees (para 10 (5) of the code) or by transfer between associated companies (para 10A of the code) does not break the continuity of employment. In each case the change is, or may be, crucial to the employer, but to the employee it is, or is likely to be, largely immaterial.

Paragraph 10 (2) of the code falls to be construed as one with the other provisions of that paragraph and against the same background. The sub-paragraph is not concerned with a sale of buildings or stock-in-trade or both. It is concerned with the transfer of ownership of a trade or business or an undertaking in the sense of a sale of the whole working environment of the employees. This includes not only the place where the employee works, but the machine or bench at which he works and the sort of work which he does there. If the failure to include the goodwill of a business in the sale has the effect of changing this environment, there has been no transfer of the business. Rather the old business has been dismembered and a new business created, a fact which will at once be apparent to and affect the employees. This, we think, is the philosophy which underlies the stress made on the transfer of a going concern in circumstances which enable the purchaser to carry on substantially the same business as before (see *Kenmir Ltd v Frizzell*¹⁵ and *Lloyd v Brassey*¹⁶) and on the automatic transfer of staff with Monday's work appearing indistinguishable from Friday's work (see *Huggins v A & J Gordon (Aveley) Ltd*¹⁷).

Factors (a) to (d) in the tribunal's list of factors pointing to a transfer of the business or undertaking are all of a nature which could affect the employees in their daily lives. Nothing was changed. They continued to work as engineers using the same equipment and skills as theretofore. Certainly the changes amounted to no more than the evolutionary changes which take place in the life of any business without creating any break in the continuity of the life of that business. Even when the manufacture of the heavy diesel engines had been completed, they still worked on the same machines and did similar types of work. Previous service would count towards their entitlements in connection with pensions, holidays and sickness benefits. There was no material change in the labour force. Friends continued to work together and so did enemies. The consolations and irritations of daily life at work remained the same.

Factors (e) and (f), the sale of the factory and most of the plant as a complete unit capable of continuing in production without interruption, sold at an enhanced price because of this facility, did not directly affect the employees although these factors point to the fact that both parties to the sale intended and expected a continuance of the stable environment to which we have referred.

Turning now to the first four factors which are said to be contra-indicative of a transfer within the meaning of the sub-paragraph, neither the absence of a sale of Crossleys' name or goodwill, nor the failure to transfer customers or the benefit of contracts, nor the failure to transfer Crossleys' debts or liabilities would have any direct or necessary effect on the employees' working environment. Perhaps it is even more important that they might well be unknown to the employees. It would be strange indeed if, in deciding whether an employee has lost rights depending on the continuity of his employment, factors which are quite unknown to him should be taken into account, still less taken into account decisively.

There remain only two other such factors. First, the tribunal rightly points out that the sale agreement is in form concerned solely with assets. But that this is not the reality is clear from the attempts, which were successful, to retain the work force intact. Secondly, the so-called 'transfer' of Crossleys' business activities to Manchester did not involve any movement of employees, which is usually a vital factor in such a transfer, or of any significant part of the plant or equipment. Apart

a from the transfer of some specialised equipment at a later date nothing seems to have happened which is inconsistent with Crossleys leaving a production unit behind them at Sandiacre, moving to Manchester and forming a completely new unit there. Closing down in one place and setting up in another with new plant, new equipment, new buildings and new employees is not a transfer of a business in the sense contemplated by the code.

b The dissenting member of the tribunal considered that the real effect of the transaction was to put the employers in possession of a going concern, which they could and did carry on without interruption. We agree. But that is not enough if this is a mere difference of view on a pure question of fact and the majority view is tenable on the evidence. However, the majority view is expressly based, and is really only tenable, upon the acceptance of the proposition that—

c ‘it was really impossible to conclude that there had been a transfer of a business when the business carried on by Crossleys was, after the sale of their Sandiacre factory, carried on by them elsewhere.’

d This proposition reveals an approach which is erroneous in law, for the tribunal is equating ‘business’ with the species of commercial activity in which Crossleys were engaged and not with the production activity carried on and the production unit situated at Sandiacre. The latter is the ‘business’ with which the code is concerned. It never changed and was transferred by Crossleys to the employers. Crossleys for their part started a new production unit of a similar type in a different place to serve their unchanged commercial activity. That commercial activity is not the business with which the code is concerned in the context of this case, although it might have been otherwise if the employees had been employed in that commercial activity, e.g. as sales representatives.

e The appeal will accordingly be allowed and the case is remitted to the industrial tribunal for them to assess the redundancy payments due in the light of our decision.

Appeal allowed.

Child – Matrimonial causes – Applications relating to children – Reservation to judge who first deals with matter.

It has for some years been the practice to regard applications relating to children in High Court matrimonial proceedings as automatically reserved to the judge who first deals with the matter, unless in any particular case he indicates that he does not desire such applications to be reserved to him.

Solicitors attending at the Divorce Registry or Clerk of the Rules Office to issue any summons relating to children should therefore ensure that the application is returnable before the judge (if any) to whom the matter is reserved, by reference to the court file if necessary. Failure to state the reservation to a particular judge may result in the summons being adjourned until such judge is available.

This practice direction does not apply to applications in causes proceeding at the Divorce Registry as in a divorce county court. Applications relating to children in such causes are reserved to a particular judge only when he so directs.

g The first and second respondents were landlords of two separate farms both let on leases which were subject to the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948. Both respondents had reserved powers in their respective leases to determine the tenancies on giving 12 months' notice expiring on Lady Day in any year. The first respondent had also, by cl 1 (3) of his lease, reserved the right pursuant to s 23 (1)^a of the 1948 Act to resume possession of any part of the farm which 'the Landlords may from time to time require for . . . any . . . purpose (not being the use of the land for agriculture)' on giving 42 days' notice. In April 1966 the Minister of Housing and Local Government granted the appellants permission under the Town and Country Planning Act 1962 to construct a reservoir and, by an order which came into effect on 7th March, h gave the appellants power to purchase land for the purpose compulsorily. Thereupon, in exercise of those powers, the appellants gave notices to treat to each of the respondents, in respect of parts of both farms. On an application to determine the amount of compensation payable to the respondents the question arose whether compensation was to be assessed on the basis that each of the respondents had an interest in fee simple subject to an annual agricultural tenancy in respect of which, j by virtue of s 24 (1)^b of the 1948 Act, they had, at the date of the notice to treat, no right to give an effective notice to quit, or that the interest was one in fee simple subject to a tenancy in respect of which, by virtue of s 24 (2) (b)^c of the 1948 Act and

c Section 24 (2) (b), so far as material, is set out at p 1065 e, post

the terms of the respective leases, the respondents were entitled to give an effective notice to quit expiring on Lady Day 1968. The further question arose, in relation to the first respondent, whether his interest was to be valued on the basis that it was subject to a tenancy in respect of which he was entitled, by virtue of s 23 (1) of the 1948 Act and cl 1 (3) of the lease, to give an effective notice to quit expiring not less than 42 days from the date of the notice.

Held – (i) (Lord Simon of Glaisdale dissenting) The respondents were entitled to compensation on the basis that their reversionary interests were, at the dates of the respective notices to treat, subject to tenancies which they could determine on 12 months' notice, for the following reasons—

(a) in view of the fact that the appellants had obtained planning permission for a reservoir for which they required the land in question, the respondents could, by virtue of s 24 (2) (b) of the 1948 Act, give an effective 12 month notice to quit, since the words 'required for a use, other than for agriculture' in s 24 (2) (b) did not refer exclusively to a requirement of the landlord in the sense that the land was needed by him for his own use or the use of some person to whom he could make a voluntary sale of his interest; the words referred to any person requiring the land including one who, having obtained planning permission, intended to make a compulsory purchase of the landlord's interest (see p 1061 a and b, p 1065 f and h, p 1067 f and p 1094 a c and f, post);

(b) although for the purpose of assessing compensation for land which had been compulsorily acquired no account was to be taken of an increase in value which was wholly due to the scheme underlying the acquisition, it did not follow that the nature of the interest to be acquired was to be disregarded merely because it had been altered as a result of the scheme; the respondents were entitled to compensation for the interest which they held at the date of the notice to treat; it was immaterial that that interest had been converted from a reversionary interest to a protected tenancy into a reversionary interest to an unprotected tenancy as a result of the appellants' scheme for the compulsory acquisition of the land (see p 1064 d and e, p 1066 h to p 1067 a c and f and p 1095 f and g, post); Ministry of Transport v Pettitt (1968) 20 P & CR 344 approved; Penny v Penny (1868) LR 5 Eq 227 and Pointe Gourde Quarrying and Transport Co Ltd v Sub-Intendent of Crown Lands [1947] AC 565 distinguished.

(ii) The first respondent was not entitled to compensation on the basis that, under cl 1 (3) of the lease, he was entitled to give 42 days' notice to quit to his tenant, since, on the true construction of cl 1 (3), it only enabled such a notice to be given where the first respondent required possession of the land so that it might be put to a non-agricultural use either by himself or by someone whom he put into possession of it (see p 1064 g, p 1067 e and f, p 1089 g and p 1095 h and j, post).

Appeals

The Rugby Joint Water Board appealed against orders of the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning MR, Phillimore and Cairns LJ) dated 22nd October 1970 and reported

f [1971] 1 All ER 373 dismissing two appeals by the appellants from decisions of the Lands Tribunal (Sir Michael E Rowe QC, President), dated 27th November 1969, and allowing a cross-appeal by the respondents to the first and second appeals, Edward Hall Foottit and Zoe Ruth Foottit. The decisions of the Lands Tribunal were on preliminary points of law in references made to the tribunal (i) by the respondents to the third appeal, Jean Helen Shaw-Fox, P H V Twist and H A Sibley, the trustees of the will of James Frederick Shaw deceased, in respect of the compensation payable

g by the appellants on the compulsory acquisition in pursuance of the Rugby and South Warwickshire Water Order 1966^d of land described as 'Parts of Draycote Farm Draycote near Rugby Warwickshire containing about one hundred and twenty four acres', and (ii) by the respondents to the first and second appeals in respect of compensation payable by the appellants on the compulsory acquisition in pursuance of h the 1966 order of land described as 'Part of the Dairy Farm, Thurlaston near Rugby Warwickshire containing about one hundred and thirty two acres'. The Lands Tribunal directed that the preliminary point of law in each of the two references should be argued and, as in substance the point of law in both was the same, the references were heard by the tribunal at the same time. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Hodson.

23rd February. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD PEARSON. My Lords, the appellants acquired certain lands under statutory powers for the purpose of making a reservoir. These lands included parts of farms of which the respondents were landlords, having fee simple reversions subject to agricultural tenancies from year to year. The present appeals are concerned with preliminary questions of law affecting the assessment of the compensation payable by the appellants to the respondents. It will be convenient to deal first with the Shaw-Fox appeal, which raises only the two main questions which are common to both appeals. The Footit case raises, in addition to those two main questions, a further question which is of less importance.

In the Shaw-Fox case the tenancy was according to the tenancy agreement terminable by a 12 months' notice to quit expiring on 25th March in any year. But prima facie the tenancy, being a tenancy of an agricultural holding, would be protected under s 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948 whereby the notice to quit, if the tenant served a counter-notice, would not have effect unless the Agricultural Land Tribunal consented to its operation. The tenancy would, however, not enjoy this protection—the notice to quit could have effect without the consent of the tribunal—if the respondents as landlords could give their notice to quit on the ground referred to in s 24 (2) (b) of the Act. The first main question is whether the respondents were entitled to act under s 24 (2) (b) at the material time in the circumstances of this case. The respondents did not in fact serve any notice to quit. The question is whether they had a right to serve one under s 24 (2) (b). The practical point affecting the compensation is that a reversion to an unprotected tenancy is in this case worth considerably more than a reversion to a protected tenancy. Section 24 (2) (b), so far as it is material, for the present purpose, provides:

'The foregoing subsection shall not apply where . . . the notice to quit is given on the ground that the land is required for a use, other than for agriculture, for which permission has been granted on an application made under the enactments relating to town and country planning . . . and that fact is stated in the notice.'

The relevant facts can be shortly stated on the basis of the Lands Tribunal's findings. In response to an application by the appellants, the Minister of Housing and Local Government, on 6th April 1966, gave to the appellants planning permission to construct a water supply reservoir on lands which included the greater part of the Shaw-Fox farm. On 22nd August 1966 the Minister made the Rugby and South Warwickshire Water Order 1966¹ which, inter alia, authorised the compulsory acquisition by the appellants of the lands forming the site of the proposed reservoir. This order came into force on 7th March 1967. On 14th March 1967 the appellants served on the respondents a notice to treat in respect of such of the lands to be acquired as formed parts of the Shaw-Fox farm.

Those facts show that before and at and after the time of service of the notice to treat the relevant land was, according to the natural and ordinary meaning of the words—

'required for a use, other than for agriculture, for which permission [had] been granted on an application made under the enactments relating to town and country planning'; and, if the respondents had given a 12 months' notice to quit on that ground stating that fact, the notice would, notwithstanding any counter-notice given by the tenant, have had effect without the consent of the Agricultural Land Tribunal to its operation. It follows that the tenancy was not a protected tenancy, and the answer to the first main question is in favour of the respondents.

The argument for the appellants on this question was that the words 'required for a use, other than for agriculture' referred exclusively to a requirement of the landlord a in the sense that the land was needed by him either for his own use or for use by some person to whom he would make a voluntary sale of his interest. But the wording affords no ground for importing such a limitation of the word 'required', and in the context the requirement of any person obtaining planning permission would naturally be included, whether such person was the landlord himself, or a person intending to negotiate for the purchase of the landlord's interest, or a person, as in the present case, intending to make a compulsory purchase of the landlord's interest. The underlying principle seems to be that a tenancy of agricultural land loses its statutory protection when the land loses its agricultural character by becoming destined for some non-agricultural use. Several other provisions of the Act—especially ss 23 (1) (b), 25 (1) (e) and (5), 31 (1) and (2) (g) and (h), 33 and 60—were referred to as throwing light on the construction of s 24 (2) (b), but I do not think they show that any limitation of the natural meaning of s 24 (2) (b) is to be implied.

c The second main question is this. Be it assumed that by reason of the appellants having obtained planning permission and requiring the land for the purpose of making the reservoir the respondents acquired the right to serve an effective notice to quit under s 24 (2) (b). Should that fact be disregarded in assessing the compensation? The appellants argue that it should, on the ground that the 'Pointe Gourde principle' applies to this case, because the landlord's right to serve an effective notice to quit was created by the appellants' scheme for acquiring the land and making the reservoir. The principle was stated in *Pointe Gourde Quarrying and Transport Co Ltd v Sub-Intendent of Crown Lands*². That was a case where, in connection with the establishment of a United States naval base in Trinidad, the Crown compulsorily acquired quarry land owned by the company, and the value of the quarry land was increased by the construction of the naval base, which was in the vicinity of the quarry land and required a large quantity of stone. It was held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that the compensation for the compulsory acquisition of the quarry land should not take into account this increase in value. Lord MacDermott said³:

f 'It is well settled that compensation for the compulsory acquisition of land cannot include an increase in value which is entirely due to the scheme underlying the acquisition.'

The principle has been applied and formulated in many cases: *Stebbing v Metropolitan Board of Works*⁴, *Re Countess Ossalinsky and Manchester Corpn*⁵; *Re Gough and Aspatria, Silloth and District Joint Water Board*⁶, in which Lord Alverstone CJ said⁷:

g 'It would be otherwise, no doubt, if there was no natural value in the place as a water site apart from the particular scheme or Act of Parliament, or, in other words, there is no value for which compensation ought to be given on this head if the value is created or enhanced simply by the Act or by the scheme of the promoters.'

h Re Lucas and Chesterfield Gas and Water Board in which Fletcher Moulton LJ said⁸:

'The principles upon which compensation is assessed when land is taken under compulsory powers are well settled. The owner receives for the lands he gives up their equivalent, i.e., that which they were worth to him in money. His property is therefore not diminished in amount, but to that extent it is compulsorily changed in form. But the equivalent is estimated on the value to him, and not on the value to the purchaser, and hence it has from the first been recognized as an absolute rule that this value is to be estimated as it stood before the grant of the compulsory powers. The owner is only to receive compensation based upon the market value of his lands as they stood before the scheme was authorized by which they are put to public uses.'

That was settled by *Pointe Gourde Quarrying and Transport Co., Ltd. v. Sub-Intendent of Crown Lands*¹⁵ ...'

*Wilson v Liverpool City Council*¹⁶.

Those are the main authorities illustrating the application of the *Pointe Gourde*¹⁵ principle, and they show that it is a principle regulating the valuation of a defined parcel of land or a defined interest in a parcel of land. It was at one stage of the argument described as a 'common law principle', but I do not think it can be that, because compulsory acquisition and compensation for it are entirely creations of statute. The *Pointe Gourde*¹⁵ principle in my opinion involves an interpretation of the word 'value' in those statutory provisions which require the compensation for compulsory acquisition to include the value of the lands taken. Examples of such provisions are s 63 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, s 5 (2) of the Land Compensation Act 1961 and s 7 of the Compulsory Purchase Act 1965.

The question to be decided is, I think, whether the *Pointe Gourde*¹⁵ principle can be extended so as to apply not only to the ascertainment of the value of a defined parcel of land or a defined interest in land, but also to the ascertainment of the nature and extent of the interest to be valued in a case where the genesis or execution of the scheme has brought about an alteration of the interest itself. In the present case the interest of the respondents as landlords, before it was affected by the scheme, was a reversion to a protected tenancy. The scheme converted it into a reversion a to an unprotected tenancy and thereby enhanced its value. Can it be said, in accordance with the appellants' proposition, that the change which the scheme has brought about in the nature of the reversion is to be disregarded in assessing the compensation?

If this proposition could be accepted, it would produce a fair result, which makes it attractive. There is an authority which gives it some general support but is distinguishable from the present case. In *Penny v Penny*¹⁷ the testator had a lease of the house in which the family business was carried on. Under his will two of his sons were entitled to occupy the house, during the subsistence of the lease, so long as they continued to carry on the business there, but if they ceased to carry on the business there the executor would be entitled to sell the leasehold interest. The Metropolitan Water Board served notices to treat on the executor and on the two sons of the testator. These notices to treat followed by the board's entry would terminate the sons' carrying on of the business in the house and so give the executor a right to sell the leasehold interest for the residue of the term. It was held that this right, created by the board's scheme, should not be taken into account in assessing the compensation. Page Wood V-C said¹⁸:

d '... I think the valuation ought to be made as at the time when the house was about to be taken, and should be made of the exact interest which the Plaintiff would at that moment have had, assuming that the house had not been taken ... As to the value of the interest, it appears to me clear that the Plaintiff's interest is not to be treated as having been increased through an act of the Board of Works ... The scheme of the Act I take to be this: that every man's interest shall be valued, rebus sic stantibus, just as it occurs at the very moment when the notice to treat was given. Any difference in the result which is due to the accident of the property being taken by a public body is not to be thrown into the compensation fund.'

f That case is distinguishable from the present case, because in that case the alteration of the interest was made only by the service of the notice to treat whereas in the present case the alteration was made (whether by the grant of the planning permission or by the making or the coming into force of the Minister's order) at some time before the service of the notice to treat.

g Another authority on this point, in which a different view was taken, is *Re Morgan and the London and North Western Ry Co*¹⁹. The claimants had granted an underlease of the land to the Swansea corporation at a low rent for the making of a public park. There was a proviso for re-entry if the land should be required or taken by a railway or other public company under the power or authority of an Act of Parliament. The railway company served the notice to treat and that brought the proviso into operation, so that the claimants were entitled to re-enter. It was held that this alteration of their interest should be taken into account in assessing the compensation. Day J said²⁰:

h 'The railway company did give notice to treat. No doubt the notice to treat at once puts an end to the right of the parties to interfere with the land or to add anything to its value. They must sell the land as of the value it was at the time the notice to treat was given, and the only question we have to determine is what was the value of the land at that time. When the notice to treat was given the effect of it was that the underlease ceased so far as the land which was comprised in the notice to treat was concerned ... What are they entitled to sell? Are they entitled to sell the land ... "as in hand and free from the underlease"? That is the very object of the provision in the underlease. To my mind,

the condition is fulfilled. The land has become in hand and free from the underlease, and the claimants are the only persons who can make a title to the land and can sell the land to the railway company.'

It is not necessary to resolve what seems to be a conflict between *Penny v Penny*¹ and the Morgan case². One can take what is common ground, namely, the principle that the nature of the claimant's interest is to be ascertained at the time of (or immediately before or immediately after) the service of the notice to treat. As Lord Donovan said in *Birmingham City Corp'n v West Midland Baptist (Trust) Association (Inc)*³;

'In the words of the textbook writers the notice to treat fixes the interest which is to be acquired.'

This is borne out by s 5 (2) of the Compulsory Purchase Act 1965 which provides:

'Every notice to treat—(a) shall give particulars of the land to which the notice relates, (b) shall demand particulars of the recipient's estate and interest in the land, and of the claim made by him in respect of the land, and (c) shall state that the acquiring authority are willing to treat for the purchase of the land . . .'

It seems to me, therefore, that the respondents are entitled to compensation for the interest which they held in the land at the date of the notice to treat, even though the nature of this interest had been altered in their favour by the inception of the appellants' scheme. There is the possible argument that the respondents' reversionary interest remained the same although its value was increased by the appellants' scheme enabling the respondents to give an effective notice to quit. But I do not think that argument is right; I think the reversion to an unprotected tenancy is a different interest from a reversion to a protected tenancy. The respondents' interest to be valued is the reversion as it existed on the date of the notice to treat, when it was a reversion to an unprotected tenancy. That is what the respondents had to sell and what the appellants must pay for. I agree with the majority decision in *Minister of Transport v Pettitt*⁴.

That is the conclusion to which I have come on this difficult question, which is the second main question in both appeals. So far as the main questions are concerned the two cases are indistinguishable. It follows that the appeal in the Shaw-Fox case fails entirely and the appeal in the Foottit case fails so far as the main questions are concerned.

There remains the minor question in the Foottit case. On that I will say simply that I agree with the opinions of my noble and learned friends Lord Hodson and Lord Cross of Chelsea, and with their reasons for allowing the appeal in the Foottit case to that extent.

Accordingly I would affirm the orders appealed from insofar as they uphold the decision of the Lands Tribunal on the main questions, and would to that extent dismiss the appeals. But I would reverse the orders appealed from insofar as they set aside the decision of the Lands Tribunal on the minor question, and would to that extent allow the appeals and restore the said decision.

Notwithstanding the appellants' success on the minor question, as they have failed on the main questions I think that in the circumstances of these cases it would be right that they should pay the respondents' costs in this House.

LORD HODSON. My Lords, three points, two substantial and one subsidiary, arise on these appeals which arise out of compulsory powers obtained by the Rugby Joint Water Board to take farmland in order to construct a reservoir. The question is as to the measure of compensation to be paid by the board to the owners of parts a of two farms both of which are let to agricultural tenants. In each lease there was a power to determine the tenancy on 12 months' notice expiring on Lady Day. In one of the leases there was a clause giving the landlord power to resume possession on 42 days' notice when the land was required for special purposes. This raises the subsidiary point.

b On 6th April 1966 the board obtained planning permission to construct a reservoir on the farms. On 7th March 1967 the order of the Minister authorising compulsory acquisition of the lands came into force. The board then served notices to treat on the owners and occupiers of the farms. It is settled that service of notice to treat fixes the date at which the extent or quality of an interest to be compensated is fixed. As my noble and learned friend Lord Donovan said in *Birmingham City Corpn v West Midland Baptist (Trust) Association (Inc)*⁵:

c 'In the words of the textbook writers the notice to treat fixes the interest which is to be acquired.'

The owners accordingly claim compensation on the basis that each of them could turn his tenant out by a notice given on 25th March 1967 to expire on 25th March 1968. The owners would be entitled to possession in one year in each case. Section d 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948 imposes restrictions on the operation of notices to quit but s 24 (2) (b) provides that the subsection previously mentioned shall not apply where—

'the notice to quit is given on the ground that the land is required for a use, other than for agriculture, for which permission has been granted on an application made under the enactments relating to town and country planning...'

e On the construction of this subsection the first point depends.

On behalf of the board it was submitted that the restrictions were not removed by the language of the subsection which I have just quoted since the whole structure of the Act compelled the requirement to be understood as meaning requirement by the landlord as opposed to requirement by a third party such as the board not claiming f through or under the landlord but acting independently as a compulsory purchaser. I agree with the Court of Appeal⁶ that there is nothing in the language of the Act to restrict the requirement to that of the landlord. This would involve writing in the word 'landlord' or implying its presence where it does not appear. Moreover there does not appear to be any sensible reason why a different result should follow when land is required for a non-agricultural use whether the requirement is that of g the landlord or a third party such as the board. Looking at the Act as a whole there are many sections where the landlord is identified by being described as such. In s 24 (2) (b) the requirement for use is not confined to use by the landlord and the object of the exception appears to be to exclude land which is required for a non-agricultural purpose from the statutory restrictions on the operation of notices to quit agricultural holdings, whether or not the requirement is that of the landlord or h someone claiming through him. I see no reason accordingly to regard the absence of the words 'by the landlord' after the word 'use' in the subsection as being casus omissus by the draftsman.

The second main contention of the board, which I will call the *Pointe Gourde*⁷ point, was concluded against them in the Court of Appeal by an earlier decision of the court in *Minister of Transport v Pettitt*⁸, but was pressed before your Lordships as the main ground of appeal. The argument was that to give compensation to the owners on the basis that each of them could turn his tenant out on a year's notice would be to enable the acquisition of land to be made at a price inflated by the scheme giving rise to the acquisition for which the grant of planning permission was a necessary and integral part.

It is well established that the value to the owner and not the value to the purchaser is relevant in the case of the exercise of compulsory powers. Were it otherwise the use of compulsory powers would be largely frustrated. The cases on this topic are, I think, all consistent with one another. The earliest example to which your Lordships' attention was directed is reported in Notes of Cases on the Law of Compensation compiled by Balfour Browne and C E Allan in 1903. The case⁹ arose from an arbitration between the Countess Mary Ossalinsky and the corporation of Manchester in 1883 in which the question whether the 'adaptability' of the land value for the purposes for which it is to be used is to be taken into consideration, as an element of value in compensating the owner, is discussed. Powers had been conferred on the corporation by the Manchester Corporation Waterworks Act 1879 for the purposes of carrying out the objects of the Act. Grove J in his judgment¹⁰ said:

'... it has been the invariable practice sanctioned by the courts that arbitrators are not to value the land with reference to the particular purpose for which it is required, particularly where the matter is under Parliamentary powers with reference to what the parties who are taking the land under compulsory powers are obliged by their necessities, or what they suppose to be their necessities, to pay for it there—that it is to be excluded from consideration, and the only way it can or ought to be put forward at all is a possible illustration of the probability of the land being useful for such a purpose. You must not look at the particular purpose which the defendants in the case before the arbitrator are going to put land to when they take it under Parliamentary powers or undertakings for any special purpose ...'

This principle has been followed invariably and has been enunciated by the Privy Council in a judgment prepared by Lord MacDermott in the case of *Pointe Gourde Quarrying and Transport Co Ltd v Sub-Intendent of Crown Lands*¹¹. He said:

'It is well settled that compensation for the compulsory acquisition of land cannot include an increase in value which is entirely due to the scheme underlying the acquisition.'

A recent application of the principle is to be found in a judgment of Widgery LJ in *Wilson v Liverpool City Council*¹². He used these words:

'... the purpose of the so-called *Pointe Gourde*¹³ rule is to prevent the acquisition of the land being at a price which is inflated by the very project or scheme which gives rise to the acquisition.'

In the instant case the increase in the value of the interests of the owners in the land must of course be disregarded but this has no application to the ascertainment of those interests. The *Pointe Gourde*¹³ principle is satisfied as the owners contend on the basis that the land is agricultural land ignoring any increased value attributable to the scheme for its use as a reservoir. As Russell LJ put it in the Pettitt case¹⁴ the principle relates—a The majority decision in the Pettitt case¹⁵ was in my opinion correct.

'not to the ascertainment of what is the interest to be valued, but the value of the interest when ascertained.'

The right to determine the tenancies was given to the owners by Act of Parliament, the land being required for a use other than agriculture and for this loss they must be compensated. Otherwise they will recover less than their loss which would be wrong: see *Horn v Sunderland Corp*¹⁶, where Scott LJ said¹⁶ that the first leading feature of what is given to the owner compelled to sell is compensation—the right to be put, so far as money can do, in the same position as if his land had not been

b taken from him. The fetter on the determination of the tenancies remains so long as the land is used for agriculture and no longer. The ability to give an effective notice to quit is an element in the value of land and cannot be disregarded. When the precise nature of the interest has been ascertained then the land can be valued.

The second main contention of the board therefore fails and I would dismiss the appeals, other than the cross-appeal.

c This last applies only to the Footitt case where the farm was the subject of a lease dated 12th August 1949 for seven years from 25th March 1949. The tenant held over after the expiration of the lease. Clause 1 (3) contains the reservation:

d (a) from time to time to resume possession of any part of the said lands and buildings which the Landlords may from time to time require for . . . any . . . purpose (not being the use of the land for agriculture) upon giving to the Tenant not less than forty two days’ previous notice in writing of such requirement . . .’

On this point the doubts expressed by Cairns LJ in the Court of Appeal¹⁷ were in my opinion well founded. There is no question of importing the word ‘landlord’ into the lease. The relevant requirement is the requirement of the landlord and this is e clearly stated and does not cover the requirement by the board. The reservation in the lease has no application. I would therefore allow the appeal of the board on this point alone.

I agree with the opinion which I understand the majority of your Lordships hold that the appellant board should pay the costs of the respondents on each of the f appeals, including the appeal on the short point last mentioned.

LORD GARDINER. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the speeches of my noble and learned friends and I would concur with the majority.

LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE. My Lords, the appellants (‘the water board’) required to construct a reservoir. To do this they had, amongst other steps to be

g taken, to obtain planning permission and power of compulsory purchase of land. The land in question involved two farms. One was owned by Mr and Mrs Footitt, the respondents in the first two of these consolidated appeals; the other was owned by the trustees of the will of the late Mr Shaw-Fox, who are the respondents in the third of the consolidated appeals.

The water board are bound to pay compensation for the land they require. It is

h common ground that a person whose property is compulsorily acquired should be paid compensation for the loss he has sustained—no more, no less. On the face of it these appeals are concerned with what compensation should be paid to the respondents in each case. But there is really more to the matter than that: the appeals are brought as test cases. The respondents in each case (or their predecessor in title)

i had let their respective farms to tenants. So the tenants too were liable to lose property in consequence of the water board’s requirements. What the tenants were losing were their leasehold interests; and what the respondents were losing were interests in fee simple in reversion on the determination of their respective tenants’ leasehold interests. It follows that the larger the tenants' interests, the more remote and less valuable were the respondents' interests as their landlords; and the shorter the tenants' interests, the nearer and more valuable were the interests of the landlords; so that the respective compensation to landlords and tenants must accordingly vary in inverse ratio (even though, owing to technicalities of valuation, the variation is not mathematically exact: the two interests do not add up, as a layman might be excused for supposing, to the value of the fee simple in possession).

Until the water board came on the scene, the tenants were in each case protected under the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948, which supervened on earlier Acts going back to 1923. That meant that they had security of tenure in the ordinary course of events: and provided they farmed efficiently (and there is no evidence that these tenants did not), there was no definite date when their leasehold interests would fall into their landlords' possession. The tenants' interests being thus enlarged by the 1948 Act, the landlords' interests were inversely diminished.

When the land was taken as a result of the water board's requirements, what the tenants in reality lost was the prospect of leasing the land indefinitely; and what the landlords in reality lost was the prospect of regaining the land at the end of the indefinite period of their tenants' holdings. Justice, one would have supposed, would require that compensation should have been assessed accordingly. But in *Minister of Transport v Pettitt*¹⁸ a majority of the Court of Appeal (Lord Denning MR dissenting) held that a tenant enjoying security of tenure under a previous but similar statute to the 1948 Act was to be treated, not as if he had the prospect of holding his tenancy indefinitely, but as if he had been turned out under a provision for a 12 months' notice to quit in his lease as unmodified by the statute; in consequence he would only get small compensation for his loss. In the cases under instant appeal the Court of Appeal¹⁹ considered themselves bound by that decision. They were bound accordingly to hold that the respondents did not, owing to the requirements of the water board, lose the prospect of resuming possession of their land at the end of an indefinite period, but rather lost the far more valuable prospect of resuming possession of their land at the end of 12 months; the respondents were accordingly entitled to large compensation for their loss—compensation which would, of course, in the end have to be paid by the people who were liable for the water rate.

Your Lordships, however, are not bound by Pettitt's case¹⁸. It is open to your Lordships to say that Pettitt's case¹⁸ was wrongly decided; that the law need not proceed on a basis of unreality and consequent injustice, treating a tenant who has in truth lost the prospect of holding his leasehold interest indefinitely as if he had lost merely the prospect of holding it for 12 months, so as to be entitled accordingly only to small compensation; that the law need not proceed on a basis of unreality and consequent injustice, treating a landlord who has in truth lost the prospect of resuming possession of his land at the end of an indefinite period as if he had lost the prospect of resuming possession of it at the end of 12 months, so that those liable for the water rate have in the end accordingly to foot the bill for large compensation to him. This is the point of the first and third appeals.

The Court of Appeal¹⁹ had to decide another point—the subject-matter of the second appeal—in relation to the Foottits only. There was a clause in their lease giving them as landlords the right to resume possession of the demised land on 42 days' notice in certain circumstances. If this clause meant what the Foottits asserted, what they had lost (and therefore what they were entitled to be compensated for) was the right to resume possession of their land, not after an indefinite period, not even after 12 months, but after 42 days (a far more valuable right still); and it would necessarily follow (although this does not fall for direct decision in this appeal) that all that their tenant would have been entitled to by way of compensation was what would reimburse him for the loss of his leasehold interest for 42 days.

a My Lords, it is the task of the courts to apply the law as established to the facts as proved; and justice will ordinarily best be done thereby. But since the laws are established by fallible human beings who cannot be expected to foresee every contingency, and since laws deal with general situations to which there may be unfortunate exceptions, it is inevitable that less than perfect justice may sometimes be done. Mercifully, such cases are infrequent; and the instruments of law reform
b have been improved of recent years. Nevertheless it must always be a matter of misgiving if the law seems to proceed on a path which diverges from reality or leads to a conclusion which does not accord with justice.

In invoking the name of justice I am not, my Lords, indulging in forensic rhetoric: the concept lies at the very heart of the legal problem with which your Lordships are concerned—namely, how compensation should be assessed in the event of compulsory purchase. Under our system of government, when private property is c required for some communal purpose the owner of the property is not expected to bear the entire burden for the benefit of his fellow citizens; the burden is shared equitably by the community, through compensation being paid to the owner to reimburse him, as far as money can do so, for what he has lost, no more, no less. However, if *Pettitt's case*²⁰ stands, the tenants get less than full reimbursement for what they have really lost; if the consequent decision of the Court of Appeal¹ in the d instant case stands, the landlords get more than full compensation for what they have really lost.

But justice is not merely at the very heart of the legal rule principally concerned in these appeals. It is also available indirectly as a touchstone to assay how far the legal rule has been correctly refined. The lands with which your Lordships are concerned will be adjacent to other lands which the water board did not require.
e Those adjacent lands too may well have been let on tenancies modified by the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948. If the legal rule is correctly refined, the tenants of the lands with which your Lordships are concerned should have been placed, so far as money compensation could do it, mutatis mutandis in a similar position to that of the tenants on those adjacent lands, not in a position that is less favourable; and the respondents
f should have been placed, so far as money compensation could do it, mutatis mutandis in a similar position to that of the owners of those adjacent lands, not in a position that is more favourable. If the rule in *Pettitt's case*²⁰ is assayed in this way it begins to look somewhat pinchbeck.

But there is yet a third respect in which justice and injustice are relevant to these appeals—at an intermediate stage, and not only as their end-products. An important question in these appeals is what is the proper construction to be put on s 24 (2) (b) of the 1948 Act. It is a canon of statutory interpretation, founded on happy experience, g that Parliament is presumed to intend justice and to avoid injustice. I believe that that canon of interpretation is available in the instant appeals, so as to preclude a construction which allows landlord or tenant to receive either more or less in money than will compensate for what has truly been lost. But however that may be, I h believe that the general law of compensation in any event says that the landlord and the tenant should each receive compensation for what has really been lost as a result of the water board requiring the land in which each had an interest. I do not, in other words, believe that this is one of those unfortunate cases where the law proceeds on a path which diverges from reality or leads to a conclusion which does not accord with justice.

I must, however, try to make good these propositions to your Lordships.

j The factual background

Mr and Mrs Footitt owned a farm of some 132 acres in the parish of Thurlaston in Warwickshire. By a lease dated 12th August 1949 they let the farm to a Mr Bowie for a term of seven years from 25th March 1949. The lease contained a reservation providing for the re-entry of the Footitts pursuant to s 23 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948 in certain circumstances; I have already referred to this clause, and I shall have to return to it in greater detail later. The lease expired on 25th March 1956; but thereafter, by virtue of s 3 of the 1948 Act, Mr Bowie remained in possession as tenant from year to year, the terms of the original tenancy being otherwise applicable.^a

The Shaw-Fox farm was of about 216 acres in the neighbouring parish of Draycote. It was let to a Mr Bailey by an agreement dated 24th March 1960, the tenancy being deemed by cl 2—^b

‘to have commenced on the Twenty-fifth day of March One thousand nine hundred and Fifty nine and continued from year to year until determined by either Landlord or Tenant on the Twenty-fifth day of March in any year by Twelve months’ notice in writing.’

The Shaw-Fox lease, like the Footitt’s lease, contained a reservation for re-entry by the landlord in certain circumstances, in this case on giving three months’ notice in writing and not extending to more than one-tenth of the farm in any one year; the purposes were certain stated non-agricultural purposes ‘or for any purpose mentioned in Section 31’ of the 1948 Act (to which I shall have to refer later); and provision was made for compensation to the tenant either by substitution of other land or by reduction of rent.^c

No notice to quit was served on either Mr Bowie or Mr Bailey under the reservation clauses or under or by reason of any other provision either contractual or statutory.^d

On 6th April 1966 the Minister of Housing and Local Government gave to the water board planning permission to construct a reservoir on part of the land demised to Mr Bowie and to Mr Bailey. So far as the Footitt/Bowie farm was concerned, the planning permission involved 129 out of the 132 acres; so far as the Shaw-Fox/Bailey farm was concerned, it was 120 out of the 216 acres. (The planning permission must, of course, have been preceded by various carefully worked out steps and statutorily required formalities.) On 22nd August 1966 the Minister made the Rugby and South Warwickshire Water Order 1966², under the Water Acts 1945 and 1948, authorising compulsory acquisition by the water board of the land forming the site of the proposed reservoir. This order came into force on 7th March 1967. The water board served notices to treat on the Footitts and on Mr Shaw-Fox (to be treated as an effective notice in respect of the Shaw-Fox land) on 11th and 14th March 1967 respectively. The notices to treat related to the parts of the land required for the reservoir and invoked the Rugby and South Warwickshire Water Order 1966² and the Compulsory Purchase Act 1965.^e

Compensation in this case falls to be assessed under the Land Compensation Act 1961 and the Compulsory Purchase Act 1965. Nevertheless your Lordships were told from the Bar (although this does not appear in the evidence), that the water board agreed with Mr Bowie and Mr Bailey that they should be paid compensation as provided by the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1968, although that Act had not come into force so as to apply to the acquisitions instantly under consideration. I shall have to refer later to the provisions of that Act, if only so as to try to eliminate any element of confusion they might import into the construction of the Acts which concern your Lordships. It is sufficient at this stage to say that the water board agreed to pay to Mr Bowie and to Mr Bailey by way of compensation for disturbance such sums as would have been so payable by their landlords in the circumstances, plus four times the appropriate portion of the annual rent.^f

I go back to the main story. References to determine the proper basis of compensation payable by the water board to the respondents were made to the Lands Tribunal. Certain issues (which are those that arise before your Lordships) should, it was agreed, be disposed of as preliminary issues of law; and since the issues in the Footitts’ case overlapped (were possibly virtually identical with) those in the Shaw-Fox case, all the references were consolidated. The Lands Tribunal were asked to^g a choose between three possible bases for compensation: (1) that the respondents' interest was a fee simple in agricultural land subject to an annual agricultural tenancy in respect of which the respondents had at the date of the notice to treat no right to give an effective notice to quit; or (2) that at the date of the notice to treat the respondents were entitled to give an effective notice to quit expiring Lady Day 1968; or b (3) that the Footitts were entitled to give Mr Bowie a 42 day notice to quit. The chairman of the Lands Tribunal, considering himself bound by *Pettitt's case*³, answered that the correct basis of valuation in both cases was that the interest to be valued was a fee simple in agricultural land subject to an annual agricultural tenancy in respect of which at the date of the notice to treat the respondents were entitled to give an effective notice to quit expiring on Lady Day 1968. As regards the contractual reservations for re-entry, the chairman said: 'I do not think that either claimant can rely on the terms of his re-entry clause'. It is not clear now far the Shaw-Fox/Bailey

c landlords have formally submitted any claim based on their own re-entry clause; at any rate that matter has not been pursued further.

The water board appealed to the Court of Appeal⁴ against the finding on the main issue; the Footitts cross-appealed against the finding on the provision for re-entry on 42 days' notice. The Court of Appeal⁴ dismissed the appeal on the main
d issue on the grounds: (1) that they were bound by *Pettitt's case*³ which could not be distinguished; and (2) that the water board's argument on a point not argued in *Pettitt's case*³, based on the construction of s 24 (2) of the 1948 Act, was ill-founded. The Court of Appeal⁴ allowed the cross-appeal by the Footitts; and held that their compensation should be assessed on the basis that they were entitled at the date of the notice to treat to give Mr Bowie a 42 days' notice to quit; Cairns LJ, however, expressed considerable doubt on this point.

e The water board now appeal to your Lordships both on the main issues and on the issue arising from the re-entry clause in the Footitt/Bowie lease. In addition to his argument based on the construction of s 24 (2) (b), counsel for the water board has argued before your Lordships, as he could not do in the Court of Appeal⁴, that *Pettitt's case*³ was wrongly decided and that the dissenting judgment of Lord Denning
f MR should be preferred.

Mr Pettitt was a tenant from year to year of a 58 acre farm. The Minister of Transport needed about seven acres of the farm for the construction of a motorway, which was to be driven right across the farm. He gave notice to treat on 6th September 1962. The question how much compensation should be paid to Mr Pettitt was referred g to the Lands Tribunal. For the purpose of the instant appeals only two of the heads of compensation need be considered—the value to be placed on the seven acres taken and the compensation for the consequent severance and injurious affection of the farm. The Minister contended that the value of the claimant's interest under both heads should be limited to the period ending with the date on which a notice to quit the required land, given at the time of entry, would have expired (which he
h contended was Lady Day 1964). The Lands Tribunal, however, held that regard was to be had to the security of tenure afforded to Mr Pettitt by the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948, in particular s 24 (1); and assessed compensation under both heads accordingly. The Minister appealed. The majority of the Court of Appeal³ (Russell and Winn LJJ, Lord Denning MR dissenting) held that, since the land was required by the Crown for a motorway, s 24 (1) was excluded by the provisions of s 24 (2) (b); i and that accordingly the claimant's interest in the seven acres which were acquired for the motorway should not be envisaged as having lasted beyond Lady Day 1964.

Lord Denning MR, in his dissenting judgment, said⁵:

5 (1968) 20 P & CR at 349, [1969] RVR at 27, 28

'Such being the respective values before the motorway scheme was announced, [ie values on the basis that Mr Pettitt had security of tenure] I think that, prima facie, the owner and the tenant should be compensated for loss of those values. The owner should certainly get no more compensation because of the motorway scheme. In the case of the owner, the Minister could invoke the principle that "compensation for the compulsory acquisition of land cannot include an increase in value which is entirely due to the scheme underlying the acquisition": see *Pointe Gourde Quarrying and Transport Co. v Sub-Intendant of Crown Lands*⁶, per Lord MacDermott. Likewise, it seems to me that the tenant should get no less compensation because of the motorway scheme. He should, I think, be compensated for the loss of his prospects of remaining in possession had there been no motorway scheme'.

'The *Pointe Gourde*⁸ principle . . . I believe to relate not to the ascertainment of what is the interest to be valued, but to the value of the interest when ascertained.'

Under this head of claim in Pettitt's case⁹, therefore, two matters were decided: (1) the tenant's property acquired should be valued on the basis that, s 24 (1) being excluded by s 24 (2) (b), the tenant at the relevant date was no longer a tenant with security of tenure under the Agricultural Holdings Act, but one liable to be turned out on a 12 months' notice to quit; and (2) the fact that he became so by virtue of the Minister's entry under compulsory powers was not a consideration that must be excluded under the *Pointe Gourde*⁸ rule. (It is true that Winn LJ did not refer expressly to this second point; but he must, I think, be taken to have agreed with Russell LJ about it.)

Counsel for the water board in the instant case argued before the Court of Appeal¹⁰ a point on the construction of s 24 (2) (b) which was not taken in Pettitt's case⁹, but which the Court of Appeal decided against him. On that footing, the Court of Appeal held that the decision on the issue in Pettitt's case⁹ with which I have just been dealing covered the instant cases. As Lord Denning MR said¹¹:

'If Pettitt's case⁹ was rightly decided (that the tenant only gets small compensation on the basis that he has only 12 months to go), it seems to follow that the owner of the farm should get large compensation on the basis that at the end of the 12 months he would get vacant possession.'

The other relevant issue in Pettitt's case⁹ is only indirectly of moment, but has a bearing on the canon of statutory construction against anomaly. The Court of Appeal upheld unanimously the Lands Tribunal decision that the tenant's compensation for severance and injurious affection was to be assessed on the basis (in effect) that he would have continued to enjoy security of tenure in respect of the whole 58 acres of the farm (which includes the seven acres taken for the motorway, compensation for which was, by the decision of the majority, to be assessed on the basis that he did not enjoy security of tenure thereof). The anomaly will be immediately apparent; but I shall have in due course to refer to it further.

There were certain matters which were common ground between the parties, and I think it would be convenient if I state them at this stage: (1) such a sum should a be paid by way of compensation to any person who has an interest in land compulsorily acquired as will reimburse him for what he has lost (although the parties differed as to how 'what he has lost' should be adjudged); (2) the date for ascertaining the interest compulsorily acquired is the date of the notice to treat (the references in *Pettitt's case*¹² to the date of entry were presumably because there was no materiality in the date of entry being different from that of the notice to treat; the date of entry in the instant cases does not appear from the evidence); (3) for the purpose of assessing compensation, the interests of the landlord and the tenant respectively must be valued on the assumption that the landlord gave notice to quit on the earliest date after receiving the notice to treat on which he could have given an effective notice to quit, even if he did not in fact give any such notice to quit; (4) the Court of Appeal¹³ in the instant case were right in regarding compensation to be paid to landlords and tenants respectively as varying in inverse ratio—in other words, if *Pettitt's case*¹² stands as good law, then (subject to the point of construction not argued in that case) the water board must fail.

d The main arguments on each side were as follows. For the water board it was principally argued: (1) on the proper construction of the Agricultural Holdings Act Mr Bowie and Mr Bailey never ceased to be tenants enjoying security of tenure; and the respondent's compensation should be assessed accordingly; (2) further, or alternatively, if Mr Bowie and Mr Bailey ceased, by virtue of some provision in the 1948 Act, to enjoy security of tenure on planning permission being given in relation to their land or on the compulsory purchase order or on the service of notice to treat, the law of compensation for compulsory acquisition of land (and in particular the *Pointe Gourde*¹⁴ rule) required that factor to be left out of account in assessing compensation.

e On behalf of the respondents it was principally argued: (1) on the proper construction of the 1948 Act (in particular s 24 (2) (b)) Mr Bowie and Mr Bailey, on planning permission being given in relation to their land or on the compulsory purchase order or on the service of the notice to treat, ceased to enjoy security of tenure and become liable to 12 months' notice to quit; (2) therefore, at the date of the notice to treat, the tenants had an annual tenancy and the respondents a fee simple in reversion to an annual tenancy and each should be compensated accordingly; (3) the *Pointe Gourde*¹⁴ rule is limited to the valuation of the interest as ascertained at the moment of the notice to treat and does not affect the ascertainment of the interest to be valued; (4) the 'scheme' for the purpose of the *Pointe Gourde*¹⁴ rule is limited to the compulsory purchase order (or the notice to treat thereunder) and does not embrace the planning permission.

g Before I turn to examine these arguments in detail, there are three general observations which I hope I can make without seeming ungrateful to counsel for the respondents for advocacy of remarkable attraction and expertise.

h First, whereas the water board can succeed by establishing either point of their argument, in order for the conclusion contended for by the respondents to be valid each link in their chain of argument must be good. In my judgment, there is not merely one link which is unsound, but every single one is so. There is therefore, in my opinion, nothing in the final concatenation to constrain your Lordships from holding, in consonance with reality and justice, that what the tenant has lost (so as to call for compensation), by reason of the water board's requirement and consequent acquisition of the land in which he had an interest, is the right to enjoy his leasehold interest in it indefinitely—with complementary effect on the landlord's interest and right to compensation.

i Secondly, the legal situation which confronts your Lordships demands ultimately a simple answer to a simple question. The question is: what has the tenant lost for which he should be compensated by reason of the fact that the land in which he enjoyed a leasehold interest was required (the word in the section of the statute on which the respondents themselves rely) by the water board in such circumstances that they compulsorily acquired it? The answer is that he has lost a leasehold interest which, by reason of the Agricultural Holdings Act, he could have expected to enjoy indefinitely. To chop the simple question up into a number of other questions the combined answers to which return some conclusion inconsistent with the simple answer is not logic but chop logic.

Thirdly, even if the argument were logically unimpeachable, that would not be an end of the matter. Logic is a handmaid of the law, not her mistress: in the famous words of Holmes J, 'The life of the law has not been logic; it has been experience'. The purpose and value of logic to the law is to ensure that persons whose relevant circumstances are similar receive similar treatment. It is, in other words, to promote equity: to use it to defeat equity is to misuse it. It follows, however, that logic is relevant when it comes to comparing the position of the respondents' tenants as compensated with adjacent tenants enjoying security of tenure under the Agricultural Holdings Act.

Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1968

I venture to interpolate at this stage some observations on the 1968 Act, in the hope of thereby avoiding its confusing the real issues before your Lordships. By s 42 compensation in connection with compulsory acquisition of an agricultural holding is expressly to be assessed without regard to the tenant's prospects, if any, of remaining in possession after the earliest date on which, apart from the acquisition or taking of possession, the landlord could obtain possession of the holding in pursuance of a valid notice to quit served on the tenant as soon as possible after notice to treat has been served on the landlord (but, interestingly, disregarding any provisions for re-entry such as are to be found in the two leases with which your Lordships are concerned). By ss 9 and 12 an acquiring authority (or, indeed, a landlord giving a notice to quit in accordance with the terms of the lease) has to pay a sum equal to four times the annual rent of the holding or, in the case of part of a holding, four times the appropriate portion of that rent, in addition to any compensation for disturbance payable by the landlord to the tenant (which itself becomes payable by the acquiring authority).

The construction of the 1968 Act is likely to present serious problems: first, it refers expressly only to the compulsory acquisition of the tenant's interest, but it might be held, on the 'inverse ratio' principle, impliedly to affect the compensation to the landlord; secondly, the Act was passed after the decision by the Lands Tribunal in *Pettitt's case*¹⁵ but before that decision was reversed by the majority of the Court of Appeal.

If *Pettitt's case*¹⁵ is affirmed, an acquiring authority may have to pay more for land subject to an agricultural tenancy than it would have to pay for similar land being farmed by the owner of the fee simple himself. What would be the position if *Pettitt's case*¹⁵ is overruled is far from easy to determine. Even assuming that the 1968 Act is construed as affecting only the tenants' interest, if *Pettitt's case*¹⁵ is overruled it does not follow that an acquiring authority will necessarily have to pay less for land subject to an agricultural tenancy than for similar land farmed by the owner in fee simple; how the respective figures compare may depend on such uncertain factors as the age and efficiency of the tenant—nor did I understand counsel for the water board to concede otherwise.

It is unusual for a later statute to be of much use in the construction of an earlier one; and this does not seem to me to be one of those exceptional cases. All that one can say is that the 1968 Act is an example of Parliament, when it wished security of tenure to be disregarded for the purpose of compensation on compulsory

Agricultural Holdings Act 1948

At common law an agricultural tenancy, like others, could be for a year or for more or less than a year. By s 2 of the 1948 Act agricultural land could not be let for a term less than a year (which would, of course, allow tenancies from year to year); and by b s 3 tenancies for two years or more, unless terminated by notice, were to continue as tenancies from year to year. (It was by virtue of this provision that Mr Bowie continued as a yearly tenant of Mr and Mrs Footitt after 1956.)

From s 23 inclusive onwards there is a series of sections dealing with notices to quit. At common law, in the absence of contrary agreement, yearly tenancies (as both tenancies with which your Lordships are dealing had become) were terminable by c half a year's notice to quit. But by s 23 12 months' notice to quit an agricultural holding or part of an agricultural holding had to be given. I must set out s 23 (1) in greater detail:

d 'A notice to quit an agricultural holding or part of an agricultural holding shall (notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in the contract of tenancy of the holding) be invalid if it purports to terminate the tenancy before the expiration of twelve months from the end of the then current year of tenancy: Provided that this section shall not apply—. . . (b) to a notice given in pursuance of a provision in the contract of tenancy authorising the resumption of possession of the holding or some part thereof for some specified purpose other than the use of the land for agriculture; . . .'

e It was by virtue of this proviso, coupled with the reservation in their lease, that Mr and Mrs Footitt claimed to be entitled to be compensated on the basis that they held a fee simple in reversion to a 42 day lease.

Section 24 may be of crucial significance in this case. It is this section (which must be read together with the succeeding ones) which, indirectly, gives the agricultural tenant security of tenure. It does this by enabling the tenant, except in certain f excluded cases, to challenge the notice to quit by a counter-notice, and thereby force the landlord to apply to the Agricultural Land Tribunal for consent to the operation of the notice to quit: if the landlord does not apply in time, or if his application is unsuccessful, the notice to quit does not take effect. I cite s 24 as amended by the Agriculture Act 1958:

g '(1) Where notice to quit an agricultural holding or part of an agricultural holding is given to the tenant thereof, and not later than one month from the giving of the notice to quit the tenant serves on the landlord a counter-notice in writing requiring that this subsection shall apply to the notice to quit, then, subject to the provisions of the next following subsection, the notice to quit shall not have effect unless the Agricultural Land Tribunal consents to the h operation thereof.

'(2) The foregoing subsection shall not apply where—. . . (b) the notice to quit is given on the ground that the land is required for a use, other than for agriculture, for which permission has been granted on an application made under the enactments relating to town and country planning, or for which (otherwise than by virtue of any provision of those enactments) such permission j is not required, and that fact is stated in the notice . . .'

Section 31 provides that notices to quit part of a holding are not to be invalid in certain cases. Such a provision was required for two reasons: first, because at common law a notice to quit part of demised land is bad in the absence of a clause in the tenancy agreement allowing such notice to be given; and, secondly, because s 23 merely said that a less than 12 months' notice to quit part of an agricultural holding should be invalid, not that a 12 months' notice to quit part of such a holding should be good. It follows that ss 23 and 24 must be read together with s 31; and, indeed, since it was in both instant cases only part of the farms that was required by the water board, that s 31 as well as s 23 must be satisfied in both cases. (The reservation in the Shaw-Fox/Bailey lease, which invokes s 31, is of no materiality, since it permitted re-entry only into one-tenth of the farm in any one year, and a bigger proportion was affected by the planning permission, the compulsory purchase order and the notice to treat.) The relevant provisions of s 31 are as follows:

'(1) A notice to quit part of an agricultural holding held on a tenancy from year to year given by the landlord of the holding shall not be invalid on the ground that it relates to part only of the holding if it is given . . . with a view to the use of the land to which the notice relates for any of the objects mentioned in the following subsection, and the notice states that it is given . . . with a view to any such use as aforesaid. . . .

Sections 32 and 33 modify s 31; and therefore, like s 31, must be read together with ss 23 and 24. Section 32 gives the tenant a right to cause a notice to quit part of a holding to operate as notice to quit the entire holding; and s 33 provides for reduction of rent where notice is given to quit part of a holding. The terms of s 33 are of great importance when it comes to construing ss 24 and 31; and I italicise the words which will be of particular significance.

'Where the landlord of an agricultural holding resumes possession of part of the holding either—(a) by virtue of subsection (1) of section thirty-one of this Act; . . . the tenant shall be entitled to a reduction of rent . . .'

The interpretation of s 24 (2) (b)

I have already cited s 24 (2) (b). It was argued for the respondents that its effect was to enable notice to quit to be given effectively under s 23, without the tenants being able to give a counter-notice under s 24 (1), since, at the moment of (or before) the notice to treat, this land was required by the water board for use other than for agriculture (ie construction of a reservoir) in respect of which planning permission had been granted. It was argued for the water board, and controverted for the respondents, that 'required' in that paragraph should be read as 'required by the landlord'. This point was not argued in *Pettitt's case*¹⁶, but the Court of Appeal¹⁷ in the instant case unanimously rejected the water board's contention. Before I come to consider the arguments put forward by each side on this part of the case, I venture to submit to your Lordships some general observations by way of approach to the questions of construction. In doing so I propose to use the terms 'Parliament' and 'draftsman' interchangeably, according as the context seems to make the use of either preferable.

The task of the courts is to ascertain what was the intention of Parliament, actual or to be imputed, in relation to the facts as found by the court. There are a number of established canons of interpretation to assist the courts in ascertaining and applying the parliamentary intention. These canons have two aspects: first, as a code of communication whereby the draftsman signals the parliamentary intention to the courts; and, secondly, as the quintessence of what experience has found to be the best guide to parliamentary intention. Different canons of interpretation will be more useful according to whether the first or second of these aspects is dominant. For example, if it seems likely that the draftsman has envisaged the actual situation facing the court, it is the more likely that an intention as to the legal result has been formed and evinced; so that the aspect of the canons as a code of communication will be

¹⁷ [1971] 1 All ER 373, [1971] 2 QB 14 (affirmed on appeal).

- a dominant, and such a rule as that the words of a statute dealing with ordinary affairs are used in their ordinary meaning and with normal grammatical sense will be particularly significant. If, on the other hand, it seems likely that the draftsman had not envisaged the actual situation facing the court, it may be necessary to impute an intention to Parliament, by trying to ascertain what in all the circumstances would have been the likely intention of Parliament in relation to the actual situation had it been envisaged; so that the aspect of the canons as the quintessence of what experience b has found to be the best guide to parliamentary intention will be dominant, and such a rule as that Parliament is to be presumed to intend justice and avoid injustice or anomaly will be particularly significant.

- But the foregoing does not exhaust every possible relationship between Parliament and the actual forensic situation which is relevant to the parliamentary intention. It may seem likely that the draftsman has envisaged the actual forensic situation, c in which case he is likely also to have evinced an intention in relation thereto. It may seem likely that the draftsman has envisaged a situation different from the actual forensic situation and evinced an intention in relation to the former which may have certain consequences for the latter: in that case it will be necessary to determine whether the consequences are inevitable; and, if not inevitable, how Parliament is d likely to have regarded the consequences—whether welcome (as consonant with the general strategy of the Act), or acceptable, or to be avoided if at all possible.

- On scrutiny of a statutory provision, it will generally appear that a given situation was within the direct contemplation of the draftsman as the situation calling for statutory regulation: this may be called 'the primary situation'. As to this, Parliament will certainly have manifested an intention—'the primary statutory intention'. e But situations other than the primary situation may present themselves for judicial decision—secondary situations. As regards these secondary situations, it may seem likely in some cases that the draftsman had them in contemplation; in others not. Where it seems likely that a secondary situation was not within the draftsman's contemplation, it will be necessary for the court to impute an intention to Parliament in the way I have described, i.e. to determine what would have been the statutory f intention if the secondary situation had been within parliamentary contemplation (a secondary intention). But since the application of the primary statutory intention to the primary situation may inescapably affect some secondary situations, there must be an overriding rule that it is inadmissible to apply any canon of construction to ascertain a secondary (or imputed) statutory intention in relation to a secondary situation if the application of that canon of construction would have the effect of g frustrating the primary statutory intention in relation to the primary situation. To apply that proposition to the instant case, it would be inadmissible to read the word 'required' as meaning 'required by the landlord' if to do so would frustrate the ascertainable statutory intention in relation to a situation which the draftsman is likely to have had in contemplation.

- That primary situation and that primary statutory intention seem to me to be beyond doubt as regards s 24 (2) (b). By serving a counter-notice under s 24 (1) the h tenant can prevent a notice to quit from taking effect without the landlord's first obtaining the consent of the Agricultural Land Tribunal. But if the notice to quit has been served because the land is required for a non-agricultural use for which planning permission has been given, a decision will already have been made that the land should be used for a purpose inconsistent with the agricultural tenancy. It was therefore necessary to obviate a second (and, theoretically, inconsistent) decision j on the very same matter. Hence the provisions of s 24 (2) (b).

Not only does this seem to me to have been, beyond any doubt, the primary situation and the primary statutory intention, I find it quite impossible in any case to believe that the primary statutory intention was to bring about the result contended for by the respondents. For one thing, it is plainly unjust, for the reasons which I have already ventured to submit to your Lordships—the most cogent among many being that the expropriated agricultural tenant does not receive compensation which places him, so far as money can do so, in a similar position to a neighbouring agricultural tenant fortunate enough not to have his land expropriated for the construction of a reservoir, so that the expropriated tenant would be required to bear personally a disproportionate burden of the cost of constructing a reservoir for communal purposes. For another thing, almost the last place where I should expect to find Parliament evincing an intention as to how compensation should be assessed on compulsory purchase of agricultural lands is in a section dealing with the machinery of counter-notices to notices to quit.

But the fact that it was not the primary statutory intention to bring about the result contended for by the respondents does not dispose finally of their case: they may be able to succeed in spelling out a secondary statutory intention in regard to a secondary situation—namely, that which actually confronts your Lordships. Moreover, although it is not difficult to discern the primary situation envisaged in s 24 (2) (b) and the primary statutory intention in relation thereto, it is less easy to be certain whether the draftsman had the instant situation in contemplation as a secondary situation (a consideration that affects which canons of interpretation are dominant); and although one can be certain that Parliament would have wished to obviate the injustice inherent in the respondents' construction if it had been possible without detriment to the vindication of the primary statutory intention, it remains for consideration whether that would be possible—to be specific, whether reading 'required' as meaning 'required by the landlord' would frustrate what is plainly the primary statutory intention in relation to the primary situation. Finally, the possibility must be borne in mind that the draftsman did have the instant situation in contemplation, but believed that injustice would be avoided by the application of the *Pointe Gourde*¹⁸ rule; if he did believe that, he was justified by the judgment of Lord Denning MR in Pettitt's case¹⁹, but was disappointed in his expectations by the majority of the Court of Appeal in that case. Parliament, of course, assumes responsibility for any mistake by the draftsman, however excusable; and Mr Pettitt, Mr Bowie, Mr Bailey, the payers of the water rate, and others in a similar position, must bear any consequent misfortune with such stoicism as they can command.

With this exordium I turn to examine the rival arguments on construction. The water board claim that the context demands that 'requires' should be read as 'required by the landlord' and that justice also so demands (construction according to context and construction to promote justice and obviate injustice both being established canons of statutory interpretation). The respondents, on the other hand, say that the words should be read in their ordinary meaning, without addition of words which could have appeared, but do not; that the general purpose of the Act demands the construction they favour; and that to read the words 'by the landlord' into the subsection would produce anomaly (construction according to plain words, construction according to the purpose of the Act and construction to obviate anomaly also being canons of statutory interpretation).

Construction according to 'plain words' and to context. I have already indicated that the canon of construction according to 'plain words' is dominant, because most relevant and therefore most useful, when the forensic situation calling for decision is likely to have been within the contemplation of the draftsman. I am perfectly convinced that the instant situation was not the primary situation with which he was concerned. On the whole I think it unlikely that the instant situation was within the draftsman's contemplation at all; although I cannot exclude the possibility that it was, and that he thought that it was taken care of by the *Pointe Gourde*¹⁸ rule. But, it is, in my view, unnecessary to pursue this question further; there is no room, in any case for the application of the 'plain words' canon—simply because the words are not plain. It is true that, if you look at s 24 (2) (b) alone, the words are plain enough, a and 'by the landlord' does not appear in the paragraph. But statutory words must always be construed in their context, and this rule applies with particular force when provisions are interdependent. I have already ventured to point out why s 24 cannot be construed alone; it is self-evidently not independent; and it must be construed along with the sections with which it is connected, which include s 33. In that section appear the words 'the landlord . . . resumes possession'. This makes it at least permissible, if not absolutely necessary, to read the words 'by the landlord' into s 24 (2) (b). I would only add, with reference to the 'plain words' argument, that this is certainly not one of those cases in which it can be said that, whatever Parliament was aiming at, it hit the respondents' target fair and square; if Parliament has hit the respondents' target, it has done so with extreme obliquity and from a most unlikely angle.

c Construction according to the purpose of the statute. It was argued for the respondents that the purpose of the statute was to affect the relationship of landlord and tenant, and to protect tenants, only so long as the land was used for agriculture. This is correct if it states no more than the truism that the Act deals with agricultural holdings, other contracts of tenancy being dealt with by the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954, from which agricultural tenancies were excepted (s 43 (1) (a)). (It is significant, however, that, in the 1954 Act, where Parliament intended that compensation on compulsory acquisition should take no account of the tenant's security of tenure, it said so expressly (s 39)—just as it did in the 1968 Act.) But I do not accept the respondents' argument that the dominant purpose of this Act was to promote efficiency of agriculture, so that its provisions are only relevant while the land is being farmed. No doubt the Act erected long-stops to guard against inefficient husbandry; but, if this had been its dominant purpose, it would have been, but is not, made a ground for a landlord's resuming possession that the land would be more efficiently farmed if he resumed possession. The dominant purpose seems to me to be quite other. This is one of those many Acts (including the 1954 Act) regulating relations between landlord and tenant, rendered necessary by inequality of bargaining power between landlord and tenant, so that reliance on the common law and the terms of the contract of tenancy was liable to cause injustice to the tenant. The inequality of bargaining power particularly affected the tenant after his rights ceased at common law, i.e. when the agricultural tenancy came to an end. To relegate the tenant to his rights at common law merely because he has ceased farming is, in fact, to run directly counter to the whole general purpose of the Act, which can be gathered from many other provisions than those which I have cited (eg those relating to compensation for tenant's improvements on the termination of the tenancy). The Act deals separately with agricultural holdings for reasons of convenience and of legal history. Other types of tenant are given security of tenure by other Acts. The canon of interpretation according to the general purpose of the Act favours the construction proposed by the water board rather than that advanced by the respondents.

g Construction with reference to anomaly. The respondents relied strongly on an argument to the following effect. Section 24 (2) (b) is not confined to planning permission obtained by a statutory undertaker prior to compulsory purchase; it applies equally to planning permission, obtained in his capacity of 'prospective purchaser', by a private developer who subsequently buys by agreement from the owner (see Town and Country Planning Act 1962, s 16). On either construction this latter case falls within s 24 (2) (b), since the land is in such circumstances required by the owner, i.e. in order to sell it to the developer. (To take such a case out of s 24 (2) (b) it would be necessary to add the further words 'required by the owner for his own purpose', which, as will appear, would frustrate the primary statutory intention.) But if an effective 12 months' notice to quit can be served in such a case, without the possibility of a counter-notice involving reference to the Agricultural Land Tribunal, what the owner has to sell to the 'prospective purchaser' who has obtained planning permission is the valuable fee simple in reversion to an annual tenancy. It would be anomalous (it is argued)

if, simply because the purchaser is a statutory undertaker acquiring the land under compulsory powers, all that the owner should have to sell would be the far less valuable fee simple in reversion to a protected tenancy. a

To this argument there are, in my judgment, four main answers. First, the alleged anomaly must be viewed as it would have appeared in 1948: contemporanea expositio est fortissima in lege. Secondly, the position of the landlord vis-à-vis his neighbouring landlord on the water board's contention is generally no more than the counterpart of that of the tenant, at best and in the particular instance, vis-à-vis his neighbouring tenant on the respondents' construction; the tenant, on the respondents' construction, will not be put, so far as money compensation can do it, in the same position as a neighbouring tenant-farmer, who continues to enjoy security of tenure. Thirdly, some other, truly startling, anomalies are thrown up on the respondents' construction. Fourthly, the law abhors anomaly because an anomaly involves treating A more favourably than B in similar circumstances; the canon of construction to obviate anomaly is, in other words, only a particular aspect of the canon of construction to obviate injustice (see Maxwell on Statutes²⁰ and Craies on Statute Law¹); and the balance of justice clearly favours the water board's construction of the statute. b

First, then, for the contemporanea expositio. By the Town and Country Planning Act 1947 all rights to develop land were nationalised, a development charge of 100 per cent being payable on all private development (s 69). A compensation fund of £300,000,000 was set up, to be paid out to persons who had development values in land in 1949, their claims if necessary to be abated rateably (s 58). It was accepted by counsel for the respondents that both landlords and tenants of the lands with which your Lordships are concerned would have had claims on the compensation fund; that, for the purposes of such claims, the tenants would have been treated not as subject to a 12 months' notice to quit, but as enjoying security of tenure under the Agricultural Holdings Act; and that the landlords' claims also would be treated accordingly. It follows that the alleged anomaly virtually disappears; the owner has in effect no development right to sell to a private developer; and both he and his tenant will have received compensation for the loss of their development rights on the basis that the tenant had security of tenure. The anomaly would be if, when it came to compensation for all that remained (existing use value), landlord and tenant were to be compensated on the basis that the tenant did not have security of tenure. The point is emphasised by the fact that the 1947 Act itself (in Part V) amended the law relating to compulsory acquisition of land. c

As for other anomalies arising on the respondents' construction, I put forward one of the most startling with some diffidence, since it was not explored in argument. However, it is a point which appears on the face of the decision in *Pettitt's case*², and I have already referred to it. It is that, although compensation for the seven acres compulsorily acquired was to be on the basis that the tenant did not enjoy security of its tenure, compensation for severance and injurious affection was to be on the basis that he did enjoy security of tenure of the whole 58 acres, including the seven acres compulsorily acquired. As Winn LJ put it³: d

... I think that there is no relevance to be attributed to the period of time at the expiry of which the claimant could be required to quit the 7.5 acres. The Act of 1845⁴ requires an assessment of the damage done to the tenancy as a whole, and this is a tenancy which, with respect to some fifty acres, would have continued for an interminable but substantial period of time. Had the whole of the land held under the tenancy, viz., fifty-eight acres, been acquired, it would, of e

- a course, have been appropriate to value the claimant's interest in the whole for such period only as he was entitled to retain possession and use of those fifty-eight acres. The fact, however, that part of the whole holding could not in the circumstances of the case be retained for as long as the rest of the holding does not, as I see the matter, mean that the damage to that part of the holding which is retained will be experienced only during the period before Lady Day 1964,
- b at which date it must be taken that the claimant's interest in the 7.5 acres would have ceased. On the contrary, so long as he holds or is taken to have been likely to have held the other fifty acres, the difference between the value to him, for the purposes of his user, of the former holding and that of the reduced holding after the loss of the 7.5 acres is a continuing loss and damage . . .

- c Applied to the Foottits' land, this would mean that Mr Bowie would be compensated for the loss of 129 acres on the basis that he did not enjoy security of its tenure; but that he would be compensated for its severance from and the injurious affection of the 129 + 3 acres on the basis that he did enjoy security of its tenure. And were reliance placed on the word 'is taken to have been likely to have held the other fifty acres' in Winn LJ's judgment, and were it said that no farmer would nowadays be likely to remain in occupation of 3 acres (even with a cow), I would point out that
- d this seems to involve the further anomaly that the more of a tenant's land is taken, the less compensation he gets.

- There is yet another anomaly, which will also be relevant when it comes to determining the ambit of the *Pointe Gourde*⁵ rule. On the respondents' construction, the landlord would be compensated for the loss of something he could never actually enjoy, even on their own argument, namely, a fee simple in reversion to an annual
- e tenancy. Fee simple nowadays implies absolute ownership—the right to enjoy, or dispose of, or transmit enjoyment of, the land in perpetuity. Two conditions have to be satisfied before s 24 (2) (b) comes into operation to preclude s 24 (1) from barring an effective notice to quit:—(i) the land must be 'required' for a use other than agriculture; (ii) planning permission must have been given for such use. The earliest
- f date that the land was 'required' for a use other than agriculture, was the date of the notice to treat (it was common ground that the landlords must be taken to have given notice to quit after receiving notice to treat). But at the very moment of the notice to treat, the landlords became liable to surrender the land to the water board.

- But the greatest anomaly of all is one I have already referred to: and it shows how far anomaly and injustice are overlapping concepts. On the respondents' construction the tenants who have been unfortunate enough to have their land required for
- g the construction of a reservoir are not placed, so far as money compensation can do it, in as favourable a position as neighbouring tenant-farmers; so that Mr Bowie and Mr Bailey are required, in effect, themselves, at their moment of expropriation, to subsidise the construction of the reservoir for the benefit of their more fortunate neighbours.

- I have no doubt that far greater and more outrageous anomalies arise out of the
- h construction proposed by the respondents than arise out of the construction proposed by the water board. I myself respectfully agree with the view of Lord Denning MR in *Pettitt's case*⁶ that the *Pointe Gourde*⁵ rule operates to prevent the landlords receiving more compensation and the tenants receiving less compensation as a result of the water board having, in order to carry out their scheme for a reservoir, had to obtain planning permission as well as a compulsory purchase order: I think that that well-
- i established rule operates absolutely to prevent any alteration of the value of the land by the operation of any part of the machinery of the scheme, so that the planning permission did not, for compensation purposes, alter a valuable protected tenancy into a less valuable annual tenancy. But if this were not so, I think that the canon of construction by context (invoking s 33) would permit, and that the canons of construction to promote justice and to obviate the balance of anomaly would demand, that s 24 (2) (b) should be read, as proposed by the water board, to mean 'required by the landlord'—unless such a reading would frustrate the primary intention of Parliament in enacting that paragraph. Finally, then, in this part of the case, I turn to consider that question.

Frustration of primary intention? To read 'required' as meaning 'required by the landlord for his own purposes' would frustrate the primary statutory intention; since, where the landlord sells to a private developer who has got planning permission as 'a potential purchaser', counter-notice could be given under s 24 (1), and the question whether the land should be used for a non-agricultural use would fall for determination afresh, this time before the Agricultural Land Tribunal. Therefore, however much such a construction would be justified by contextual indications (which I cannot, in fact, find), and however requisite such a construction might be to do justice or prevent an anomaly, such a construction would be inadmissible. But merely to read 'required' as meaning 'required by the landlord', would not, in my view, frustrate the primary statutory intention. There are only three situations which need be considered: first, cases of compulsory acquisition like the instant; secondly, the landlord himself being the developer; and, thirdly, the 'potential purchaser' being the developer. The first situation presents no difficulty; notice to quit is not in fact given, but is purely notional; so that the water board's interpretation only affects the quantum and incidence of compensation, and does so in a way to obviate injustice and anomaly. Nor does the second situation (i.e. where the landlord is himself the developer) present any difficulty; the case falls squarely within the words 'required by the landlord'; and no counter-notice can be given. Nor does the third case (planning permission obtained by a 'potential purchaser'); the land is required by the landlord—for sale to the 'potential purchaser'. It follows that in none of the three cases would a second hearing of the question of non-agricultural use be involved; so that the primary statutory intention will not be frustrated.

It further follows that, in my view, the construction proposed by the water board is the correct one. But, were this not so, I think that they are right on the applicability of the *Pointe Gourde*⁷ rule, to which I now turn.

*The Pointe Gourde*⁷ rule

The status of the rule has not been questioned; the only question has been as to its ambit. It has a long history and high authority. It is most conveniently stated in the case which has lent it the name by which it is now usually known: *Pointe Gourde Quarrying and Transport Co Ltd v Sub-Intendent of Crown Lands*⁷. In connection with the establishment of a naval base in Trinidad, the Crown compulsorily acquired quarry land owned by the appellant company. The value of the quarry land was increased by the construction of the naval base, which was nearby and required a large quantity of stone. It will be noted that this increased value was due, not to the compulsory acquisition itself, but to the undertaking for the benefit of which the compulsory powers were used. (To apply it to the present case, for 'naval base' read 'reservoir'.) The Privy Council held that the compensation for the quarry land compulsorily acquired should not take into account its increase in value due to the construction of the naval base. Lord MacDermott said⁸:

I venture to draw particular attention to the words I have italicised. It is not merely the effect on value of the acquisition itself which must be discounted, but also the

a effect on value of the underlying scheme. This is in line with numerous previous statements of the rule: I cite only a few of the many that are available (in all cases the italics are mine). In *Re Gough and Aspatria, Silloth and District Joint Water Board*⁹, Lord Alverstone CJ, presiding over the Court of Appeal, cited with approval what had been said, in the judgment appealed from, by Wright J¹⁰:

b '... there is no value for which compensation ought to be given... if the value is created or enhanced simply by the Act or by the scheme of the promoters.'

Lord Alverstone CJ added: 'In my opinion that clearly expresses what is the law on the matter'. It will be noted that it is not simply the value created or enhanced by the Act which gave compulsory powers of acquisition which must be discounted, but any value created or enhanced by the scheme of the promoters. In *Re South Eastern Ry Co and London County Council's Contract*¹¹ Eve J, in a judgment affirmed by the Court of Appeal, stated the law as follows, his second, fourth and fifth propositions being the ones of crucial importance:

d '... the following propositions may, I think, be treated as established by authorities binding on this Court: (1.) The value to be ascertained is the value to the vendor, not its value to the purchaser; (2.) in fixing the value to the vendor all restrictions imposed on the user and enjoyment of the land in his hands are to be taken into account, but the possibility of such restrictions being modified or removed for his benefit is not to be overlooked; (3.) market price is not a conclusive test of real value; (4.) increase in value consequent on the execution of the undertaking for or in connection with which the purchase is made must be disregarded; (5.) the value to be ascertained is the price to be paid for the land with all its potentialities and with all the use made of it by the vendor; and (6.) the true contractual relations of the parties—that of purchaser and vendor—is not to be obscured by endeavouring to construe it as another contractual relation altogether—that of indemnifier and indemnified.'

In *Viscount Camrose v Basingstoke Corpn*¹² Lord Denning MR said:

f '... you do not take into account an increase in value of that parcel of land if the increase is entirely due to the scheme involving the acquisition.'

All these statements show that you must discount not merely value engendered by the acquisition itself but also value engendered by the scheme underlying or involved. But there is further high authority throwing light on what is meant by 'scheme' in this connection. In *Fraser v Fraserville City*¹³ Lord Buckmaster said:

g '... the value to be ascertained is the value to the seller of the property in its actual condition at the time of expropriation with all its existing advantages and with all its possibilities, excluding any advantage due to the carrying out of the scheme for which the property is compulsorily acquired, the question of what is the scheme being a question of fact for the arbitrator in each case.'

h In *Wilson v Liverpool Corpn*¹⁴ Widgery LJ, a learned judge who has had deeper and wider experience of this branch of the law than any who has sat on the bench, said:

j 'Whenever land is to be compulsorily acquired, this must be in consequence of some scheme or undertaking or project. Unless there is some scheme or undertaking or project compulsory powers of acquisition will not arise at all, and it would I think be a great mistake if we tended to focus our attention on the word "scheme" as though it had some magic of its own. It is merely synonymous with the other words to which I have referred, and the purpose of the so-called *Pointe Gourde*¹⁵ rule is to prevent the acquisition of the land being at a price which is inflated by the very project or scheme which gives rise to the acquisition'.

My Lords, if this is, as I believe, a correct statement of the law, it is, in my respectful submission, conclusive of these appeals. It is clear from this cited passage, as well as from the other passages that I have cited, that 'scheme', when used in the authorities in this branch of the law, extends to matters arising before, though connected with, the compulsory purchase. Although what the 'scheme' consists of is a question of fact it is a question which in the instant cases admits of only one answer. The obtaining of planning permission for their reservoir was unquestionably part of the 'scheme or undertaking or project' of reservoir construction, in furtherance of which the water board's compulsory powers of acquisition, too, were exercised. To apply the actual terminology of Widgery LJ, the so-called *Pointe Gourde*¹⁵ rule prevents the acquisition of the land in question here being at a price which is inflated by the very project or scheme which gives rise to the acquisition; it therefore prevents the acquisition of these lands being at a price which is inflated by the planning permission which is part of the very project or scheme which gave rise to the acquisition; and, since the compensation payable to the tenant varies inversely with that paid to the landlord, the *Pointe Gourde*¹⁵ rule prevents the acquisition of the former's interest in the land being at a price which is deflated by the planning permission which is part of the very scheme or undertaking or project which gave rise to the acquisition.

Faced with a rule, carefully framed by high authority, which on the face of it applies exactly to the instant appeals, the respondents relied on the pungently expressed dictum of Russell LJ in *Pettitt's case*¹⁶:

'The *Pointe Gourde*¹⁵ principle . . . I believe to relate not to the ascertainment of what is the interest to be valued, but to the value of the interest when ascertained.'

My Lords, I believe that to attempt so to confine the *Pointe Gourde*¹⁵ rule is at variance with principle, is devoid of authority (indeed, contrary to authority), and is potential of injustice. I have already referred to the injustices; and I do not propose to repeat them.

As for principle, it is wrong to treat the *Pointe Gourde*¹⁵ rule as a fundamental rule standing by itself—as can be seen from Eve J's tabulation¹⁷. On the contrary, it is a subsidiary rule, evolved to ensure that the fundamental rules of compensation are correctly applied where the value of the land acquired is affected by the scheme or undertaking or project underlying the acquisition. The basic rule is thus stated in *Cripps on Compulsory Acquisition of Land*¹⁸:

'What the Act gives to the owner compelled to sell is compensation, the right to be put so far as money can do it, in the same position as if his land had not been taken from him. In other words, he gains the right to secure a money payment not less than the loss imposed on him in the public interest, but on the other hand no greater.'

The judgment of Scott LJ in *Horn v Sunderland Corpn*¹⁹ is clear authority for this proposition. He said²⁰:

a '... what it gives to the owner compelled to sell is compensation—the right to be put, so far as money can do it, in the same position as if his land had not been taken from him. In other words, he gains the right to receive a money payment not less than the loss imposed on him in the public's interest, but, on the other hand no greater.'

In a subsequent passage he said¹:

b 'The statutory compensation cannot and must not exceed the owner's total loss, for, if it does, it will put an unfair burden upon the public authority or other promoters, who on public grounds have been given the power of compulsory acquisition, and it will transgress the principle of equivalence which is at the root of statutory compensation, which lays it down that the owner shall be paid neither less nor more than his loss.'

c The purpose of the *Pointe Gourde*² rule is thus clear. You must not allow the price to be paid for property compulsorily acquired to be inflated by reason of the fact that it is acquired compulsorily under parliamentary powers, because you would then be making the acquiring authority pay, not for the value of the property to the vendor, but for its value to themselves, including the value engendered by the very powers by which they acquired the property. Nowadays, powers by which acquiring authorities take over property compulsorily generally include not merely those of compulsory purchase but also of change of land use by planning permission, and the principle which excludes value engendered by powers of compulsory purchase equally applies to value engendered by planning permission. Moreover, if the price cannot on principle be inflated in this way, neither can it be so deflated.

d The confinement of the rule in the way contended for by the respondents strikes at the very root of this principle. What your Lordships are concerned with is compensation which will put the interested parties, so far as money can do so, in the position that they would have enjoyed if there had been no scheme requiring the surrender of those interests for an overriding public benefit.

e Just how artificial, legalistic and destructive of the fundamental principles on which compensation is assessed it would be to attempt to restrict the *Pointe Gourde*² rule in the way contended for by the respondents can be easily seen by accepting their construction of s 24 (2) (b), and then testing the value in the open market of the various interests in the land at various relevant times. Take first the interest of the landlords. It became more valuable as soon as the scheme for the reservoir was adumbrated, albeit that that interest was still a fee simple in reversion to a protected tenancy.

f It became then more valuable because, precisely from that moment, there arose a potentiality of the instant situation, whereby (ex hypothesi) the landlords would, on receiving notice to treat, be able to give their tenants an effective 12 months' notice to quit. When planning permission was given, the landlords' interest became more valuable still (albeit still in reversion to a protected tenancy), because the potentialities became even more likely to be realised. And still more valuable again, for the same reason, when the Minister made his order; and again when the order came into force. If the landlord had sold at any time during the period, these increases in value, due to the growing imminence of the potential notice to treat, would have been reflected in the market price. It is the market price which prima facie determines the compensation, except insofar as the market price reflects a value generated by the scheme of the acquiring authority. But every increase in value that I have just been considering had been generated by the scheme of the acquiring authority in connection with which compulsory acquisition took place—while the interest of the landlords remained precisely the same (the ownership in fee simple in reversion to a protected tenancy). The notice to treat is only the final step, converting the growing potentiality, which has been reflected in growing value and steadily rising market price, into actuality, whereupon there was yet again an increase in value which would have been reflected in the market price. All these changes in value, all generated by the scheme in connection with which compulsory acquisition took place, must, in accordance with long established principles, be left out of account in assessing compensation.

And while the value of the landlord's interest had been steadily growing during this period, that of the tenant had been decreasing inversely, albeit his interest had remained throughout that of a protected tenant. It has been decreasing for precisely the same reason that the value of the landlord's interest had been increasing—namely, because the scheme in connection with which compulsory powers of acquisition would be used had been going steadily forward, bringing steadily more imminent the moment of the notice to treat, when (ex hypothesi) the protected tenancy was converted into an annual tenancy which the landlord would be able to give 12 months' notice to quit under s 23 unrestricted by s 24. All this surely shows how artificial, unjust and destructive of its rationale it is to attempt to limit the *Pointe Gourde*³ rule to the valuation of the interests as ascertained at the meta-physical moment of the notice to treat.

My Lords, not only is the respondents' attempted confinement of the *Pointe Gourde*³ rule, in my view, contrary to the principle underlying the rule, and oblivious of the necessities which led to its framing; such a confinement is also, I believe, contrary to authority. I have already quoted, from several cases of high authority, formulations of what is now called the *Pointe Gourde*³ rule which are inconsistent with the contentions for the respondents. I content myself with only two more. In *Re Lucas and Chesterfield Gas and Water Board*⁴ Fletcher Moulton LJ said:

'The principles upon which compensation is assessed when land is taken under compulsory powers are well settled. The owner receives for the lands he gives up their equivalent, i.e., that which they were worth to him in money. His property is therefore not diminished in amount, but to that extent it is compulsorily changed in form. But the equivalent is estimated on the value to him, and not on the value to the purchaser, and hence it has from the first been recognized as an absolute rule that this value is to be estimated as it stood before the grant of the compulsory powers. The owner is only to receive compensation based upon the market value of his lands as they stood before the scheme was authorized by which they are put to public uses.'

In the instant cases, the inception of the authorisation of the scheme by which the lands were put to public uses was, at latest, the giving of planning permission. As for the equivalent in money to what has been lost, I have already pointed out in an earlier section of this speech that the respondents could never in reality have at their disposal a fee simple in reversion to an annual tenancy, because they were statutorily bound to surrender that interest to the water board at the very moment they acquired it—on the service of the notice to treat.

My last citation, by way of formulation of the *Pointe Gourde*³ rule is from the opinion of the Privy Council in *Cedar Rapids Manufacturing and Power Co v Lacoste*⁵. Lord Dunedin said:

'... the value ... is merely the price, enhanced above the bare value of the ground which possible intended undertakers would give. That price must be tested by the imaginary market which would have ruled had the land been exposed for sale before any undertakers had secured the powers, or acquired the other subjects which made the undertaking as a whole a realized possibility.'

Among the powers which the water board secured to make the undertaking as a

a whole a realised possibility was the planning permission. Compensation, said Lord Dunedin, must be based on the price which the land would have fetched before obtaining those powers. These lands with which your Lordships are concerned would at that time have fetched only such price as a fee simple in reversion to a statutory tenancy would have commanded.

b Apart from Pettitt's case⁶ itself, the only authority which remotely supports the limitation of the *Pointe Gourde*⁷ rule proposed by the respondents is *Re Morgan and the London and North Western Railway Co.*⁸ The claimants had granted an underlease of the land in question to the local corporation for the making of a public park. The under-lease contained a proviso for re-entry if the land or any part of it should be 'required or taken by a railway or other public company under the power or authority of an Act of Parliament'. (I draw attention to the word 'required', which is the same as that used in s 24 (2) (b).) A railway company acting under powers c conferred on them by Act of Parliament gave notice to treat for, and took possession of, part of the land. The claimants did not actually re-enter any part of the land, but they claimed compensation on the basis that they were entitled to do so. It was argued for the railway company that—

d 'the Act of the Company cannot increase the value of the land to the claimants: *Penny v Penny*⁹.'

This was the only authority cited on behalf of the railway company on the point of what would now be called the *Pointe Gourde*⁷ rule. The Divisional Court held that compensation should be assessed on the basis that the land was land in hand. I do not think that Morgan's case⁸ was at all a decision on the *Pointe Gourde*⁷ principle; e if it were, I would, I confess, find that case difficult to distinguish from the instant cases: on the other hand, on such a basis I would find it even more difficult to distinguish from *Penny v Penny*⁹, which was decided the other way and which was not even referred to in the judgment in Morgan's case⁸. Morgan's case⁸ was decided before the days of protected tenancies, and the common law of contract, which various statutes have since modified in the interest of tenants, gave a perfectly clear f answer, even though Day J said¹⁰ that he had not arrived at his conclusion without difficulty. The ratio decidendi in my view, is¹¹:

'... that which was thought possible or probable by the parties, when the claimants granted the underlease . . . , occurred.'

In other words, the parties to the underlease envisaged that the land might be g compulsorily acquired, and agreed that in that event the claimants should recover possession, so as to be in a position to claim compensation on that basis (they could not in the circumstances be recovering possession of the land for their own enjoyment). Again¹¹,

'... the claimants are the only persons who can make a title to the land and can sell the land to the railway company.'

h Both these passages are sufficient to distinguish Morgan's case⁸ from Pettitt's case⁶ or the instant appeals.

In *Penny v Penny*⁹ a testator had a lease of a house in which a family business was carried on. His will provided that two sons should be entitled to occupy the house during the subsistence of the lease 'so long as they may carry on the business therein'.

j The Metropolitan Board of Works, acting under powers of compulsory acquisition, served notice to treat on the executor/trustee and on the two sons. The notice to treat (or at least the entry thereunder) would preclude the sons from carrying on business in the house. The issue was how the interests of the executor/trustee (plaintiff) and the sons (defendants) should be valued. Page Wood V-C by his order declared—

'that the Plaintiff, as executor, is entitled to the leasehold premises, subject to the interest of the Defendants . . .; . . . that [the Defendants] . . . are . . . entitled to hold, use, occupy and enjoy the said leasehold premises, so long as they . . ., but for the taking of the same premises by the Metropolitan Board of Works, might have carried on the business therein . . .', and then proceeded to deal with the valuation accordingly. The learned judge said¹²:

' . . . the Plaintiff's interest is not to be treated as having been increased through an act of the Board of Works . . . It is not the interest which has been acquired by the Board that has to be estimated, but the value of the interest taken from the person with whom the Board deals . . . every man's interest shall be valued, rebus sic stantibus, just as it occurs at the very moment when the notice to treat was given. Any difference in the result which is due to the accident of the property being taken by the public body is not to be thrown into the compensation fund.'

That case is, in my view, on all fours with *Pettitt's case*¹³ and with the instant appeals. The sons correspond with Mr Pettitt, Mr Bowie and Mr Bailey. The executor/trustee corresponds with Mr Pettitt's landlord and with the respondents. The Metropolitan Board of Works corresponds with the Minister of Transport and the water board. To translate, Page Wood V-C says and orders that the instant respondents' interests are not to be treated as having been increased through an act of the water board, and he orders that Messrs Pettitt, Bowie and Bailey are to be treated for valuation purposes as entitled to hold, use, occupy and enjoy their respective agricultural holdings as long as they, but for the taking of those holdings by the Minister of Transport or by the water board, might have carried on their farming business therein. I have already pointed out that s 24 (2) (b) does not operate until the two conditions are fulfilled of there having been planning permission for non-agricultural use and the land being 'required' for such use. The lands with which your Lordships are concerned were only 'required' when notice to treat was served, just as the land in *Morgan's case*¹⁴ was only 'required' when notice to treat was given. The alteration of value, consequent on alteration of interest, in all these cases took place on the service of the notice to treat. Such alterations, said Page Wood V-C, in entire consonance with the authorities in this branch of the law and their underlying principle, must be left out of account in assessing compensation.

The only way in which *Morgan's case*¹⁴ can be distinguished from *Penny v Penny*¹⁵ is by regarding the underlease in the former case as containing a provision whereby, on a contemplated compulsory acquisition, the underlessee should enjoy the entire compensation payable to the exclusion of the underlessee—the language of Day J's judgment justifies such a view of this decision. But it is not, in my view, authority that an alteration of value consequent on an alteration of interest, itself consequent on service of a notice to treat (or any other act of an acquiring authority), may be taken into account in assessing compensation; that would be directly contrary to *Penny v Penny*¹⁵, which *Morgan's case*¹⁴ did not purport either to disapprove of or to distinguish. *Morgan's case*¹⁴ is, however, useful as throwing light on the meaning of 'required' in connection with acquisition of land, and thus on s 24 (2) (b); it shows a that land is 'required' by an acquiring authority on service of the notice to treat—though this is how I should have so construed it independently of any authority. (No different result, however, ensues if the land is taken to be 'required' at the moment of the planning permission or the compulsory purchase order; both are part of 'the scheme or undertaking or project'; and their effect on valuation must be disregarded.)

b Conclusion of the main issue

For the foregoing reasons, in my view, *Pettitt's case*¹⁶ was wrongly decided. I agree with the dissenting judgment of Lord Denning MR. I would overrule *Pettitt's case*¹⁶ and allow these appeals.

The special term in the Foottits' lease

c There were a number of reservations in the Foottit/Bowie case. The one that is in question in this part of the appeals is numbered 1 (3) (a) and reads as follows:—

'The right pursuant to Section 23 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948—

(a) from time to time to resume possession of any part of the said lands and buildings which the Landlords may from time to time require for building mining roadmaking or any purposes connected therewith or for any other purpose (not being the use of the land for agriculture) upon giving to the Tenant not less than forty-two days' previous notice in writing of such requirement . . .'

The Foottits' claim that this reservation became operative in the circumstances of the present case. The landlords, they say, required to resume possession of part of the demised land pursuant to s 23 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1949 for a e purpose not being the use of the land for agriculture (i.e. construction of a reservoir)—not, it is true, so that they could themselves use the land for such purpose, but so that the water board could do so. It is not to be thought, the argument continues, that the landlords must themselves do the building, mining, roadmaking or reservoir construction; it is enough that they require the land so that those purposes can be carried out. Within the context of the lease the only person who can require the

f demised land is the landlord. The Foottits should therefore, it is claimed, be compensated on the basis that they had a fee simple in reversion to a lease of 42 days—with the concomitant result that the tenant would be entitled to compensation on the basis that all that he has lost was a 42 day leasehold interest in the demised land.

All my noble and learned friends who heard this appeal are, I understand, agreed that the argument for the Foottits on this part of the case is not valid, and that the g appeal must succeed to that extent. I entirely agree. The land was not 'required' by Mr and Mrs Foottit, and certainly not for any purpose contemplated by s 23 (1); it was 'required' by the water board, just as it was 'required' by the water board in the purpose of s 24 (2) (b).

LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA. My Lords, these are appeals by the Rugby

h Joint Water Board ('the board') against three orders of the Court of Appeal¹⁷ each made on 22nd October 1970 dismissing two appeals by the board and allowing a cross-appeal by the respondents Edward Hall Foottit and Zoe Ruth Foottit from decisions of the Lands Tribunal given on 27th November 1969.

The facts are as follows. Mr and Mrs Foottit owned a farm of some 132 acres in the parish of Thurlaston in Warwickshire which by a lease dated 12th August 1949

j they let for seven years from 25th March 1949 to a Mr Bowie. Clause 1 (3) of that lease was in the following terms:

'The right pursuant to Section 23 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948—
(a) from time to time to resume possession of any part of the said lands and

buildings which the Landlords may from time to time require for building mining roadmaking or any purposes connected therewith or for any other purpose (not being the use of the land for agriculture) upon giving to the Tenant not less than forty two days' previous notice in writing of such requirement and allowing to the Tenant fair and reasonable compensation either by the substitution of other land for the land so required or by allowing a proportionate reduction in rent and also making compensation for every crop or preparation for a crop on the land of which the Landlords resume possession and (b) from time to time to resume possession of the farm buildings adjacent to the Landlords' dwellinghouse included in this demise in the following events (i) If the Landlords should desire to occupy them in order to increase the amenities of the Landlord's dwellinghouse (ii) If the Landlords should desire to vacate their dwellinghouse and dispose of the same with vacant possession (iii) If the Landlords should build other farm buildings appropriate to the Farm on land hereby demised in which case no reduction of rent in respect of the land so built upon or buildings so surrendered shall be made PROVIDED that any such notice by the Landlords shall not terminate or entitle the Tenant to terminate the tenancy hereby created except in regard to the land of which possession is resumed'.

After the expiry of the lease in 1956 Mr Bowie remained in possession as tenant from year to year.

The respondent Jean Helen Shaw-Fox was tenant for life of a farm of some 216 acres in the parish of Draycote in Warwickshire under a settlement of which her co-respondents, Patrick Hare Vivian Twist and Harold Ashworth Sibley, were trustees with her for the purposes of the Settled Land Act 1925. By a tenancy agreement dated 24th March 1960 Mrs Shaw-Fox let this farm to a Mr Bailey from 25th March 1959 on a tenancy from year to year which was expressed to be determinable by either party on 25th March in any year by 12 months' notice in writing.

On 6th April 1966 the Minister of Housing and Local Government granted the board permission under the Town and Country Planning Act 1962 to construct a water supply reservoir pumping station and ancillary works on land in the parishes of Thurlaston and Draycote which included parts of the farms let to Mr Bowie and Mr Bailey. By para 14 of the Rugby and South Warwickshire Water Order¹⁸ made on 22nd August 1966 by the Minister of Housing and Local Government under powers conferred on him by the Water Acts 1945 and 1948 and which came into operation on 7th March 1967 the board was given power to purchase compulsorily such of the lands shown on the deposited plans and described in the deposited book of reference as they might require for the purposes of the construction of the works authorised by the order. On 11th and 14th March 1967 the board, acting under their compulsory powers, gave notices to treat to Mrs Shaw-Fox in respect of 120 of the 216 acres of her farm and to Mr and Mrs Footitt in respect of 129 of the 132 acres of their farm. On 4th October 1968 Mrs Shaw-Fox, Mr Twist and Mr Sibley applied to the Lands Tribunal for the determination by the tribunal of the amount of compensation payable to them as trustees of the relevant settlement in respect of the compulsory acquisition of their interest in the lands to which the notices to treat of 11th March 1967 related and on 7th March 1969 the board applied to the tribunal for the determination of the following preliminary point of law:

"That it may be determined on which of the following bases the interest of the Claimants is to be valued: namely (a) That such interest is an interest in fee simple in agricultural land subject to an annual agricultural tenancy in respect of which the Claimants had at the date of the Notice to Treat no right to give an effective Notice to Quit; or (b) That such interest is an interest in

- a* fee simple in agricultural land subject to an annual agricultural tenancy in respect of which at the date of the Notice to Treat the Claimants were entitled to give an effective Notice to Quit expiring at Lady Day, 1968.'

On 28th May 1969 Mr and Mrs Foottit made a similar application to the Lands Tribunal in respect of the lands affected by the notice to treat dated 14th March 1967 and on the same day the board applied to the tribunal for the determination

- b* of the following preliminary point of law:

- c* 'That it may be determined on which of the following bases the interest of the Claimants is to be valued, namely: (a) That such interest is an interest in fee simple in agricultural land subject to an agricultural tenancy in respect of which the Claimants had at the date of the Notice to Treat no right to give an effective Notice to Quit; (b) That such interest is an interest in fee simple in agricultural land subject to an annual agricultural tenancy in respect of which at the date of the Notice to Treat the Claimants were entitled to give an effective Notice to Quit expiring in not less than 42 days from the date of such Notice as provided in the Tenancy Agreement dated the 12th August 1949 and made between the Claimants of the one part and John George Morrison Bowie of the
- d* other part relating to the said land.'

As the preliminary point of law in each case was substantially the same the Lands Tribunal (Sir Michael Rowe QC) heard both together on 27th November 1969.

- e* Under s 7 of the Compulsory Purchase Act 1965 which was the provision applicable to this case the tribunal, in assessing the compensation to be paid by the board, has to have regard, inter alia, to the value of the land to be purchased. In a case such as this where the land is subject to a tenancy what the tribunal must have regard to in assessing the compensation to be paid to the freeholder must be the value of his interest in the land—namely the fee simple in reversion on the tenancy—and in order to value that it is obviously necessary to know the incidents of the tenancy and in particular its length. To discover that one has to consider not only the tenancy agreement but some provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948. By s 1 of the
- f* Act the expression 'agricultural holding' means the aggregate of the agricultural land comprised in a contract of tenancy and 'agricultural land' means land used for agriculture which is so used for the purpose of a trade or business. The following provisions in ss 23, 24 and 31 of the Act are particularly relevant to this case:

- g* '23. (1) A notice to quit an agricultural holding or part of an agricultural holding shall (notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in the contract of tenancy of the holding) be invalid if it purports to terminate the tenancy before the expiration of twelve months from the end of the then current year of tenancy: Provided that this section shall not apply— . . . (b) to a notice given in pursuance of a provision in the contract of tenancy authorising the resumption of possession of the holding or some part thereof for some specified purpose other than the
- h* use of the land for agriculture . . .

- j* '24. (1) Where notice to quit an agricultural holding or part of an agricultural holding is given to the tenant thereof, and not later than one month from the giving of the notice to quit the tenant serves on the landlord a counter-notice in writing requiring that this subsection shall apply to the notice to quit, then, subject to the provisions of the next following subsection, the notice to quit shall not have effect unless the Minister [now the Agricultural Land Tribunal] consents to the operation thereof.

'(2) The foregoing subsection shall not apply where—. . . (b) the notice to quit is given on the ground that the land is required for a use, other than for agriculture, for which permission has been granted on an application made under the enactments relating to town and country planning, or for which (otherwise than by virtue of any provision of those enactments) such permission is not required, and that fact is stated in the notice . . .

'31. (1) A notice to quit part of an agricultural holding held on a tenancy from year to year given by the landlord of the holding shall not be invalid on the ground that it relates to part only of the holding if it is given for the purpose of adjusting the boundaries between agricultural units or amalgamating agricultural units or parts thereof or with a view to the use of the land to which the notice relates for any of the objects mentioned in the following subsection, and the notice states that it is given for the said purpose or with a view to any such use as aforesaid, as the case may be.

The question which arises is, of course, whether the reversionary interests of these landlords were at the dates of the respective notices to treat subject to tenancies which the landlords could determine on 12 months' notice without the consent of the Agricultural Land Tribunal or to tenancies in respect of which the tenants enjoyed statutory protection. This question came before the Court of Appeal in the case of *Minister of Transport v Pettitt*¹⁹ in relation to the valuation of the interest of a tenant. Mr Pettitt was tenant from year to year of a 58 acre farm. In 1962 the Minister in pursuance of a compulsory purchase order gave notice to treat and enter in respect of seven acres needed for the construction of a motorway. The Minister contended before the tribunal that Mr Pettitt's interest should be regarded as an interest for a period ending with the date on which a notice to quit given by his landlord at the time of the notice to treat would have expired, i.e. Lady Day 1964. The tribunal rejected that contention and held that the interest must be valued on the footing that the tenant had the security of tenure afforded by the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948, s 24 (1). On appeal by the Minister the Court of Appeal¹⁹ (Russell and Winn LJJ, Lord Denning MR dissenting) reversed the decision of the tribunal on this point. It appears not to have been argued in that case that as a matter of construction of the Act the landlord would not have served notices to quit since the land was not required for non-agricultural use by him or by anyone who could claim under him but by a public authority exercising compulsory powers. The ground on which Lord Denning MR dissented was that the Minister was contending that the compensation payable to the tenant should be decreased by the existence of the motorway scheme which gave the landlord the right to serve a notice to quit and that such a contention was precluded by the principle illustrated by the Privy Council decision in *Pointe Gourde Quarrying and Transport Co Ltd v Sub-Intendent of Crown Lands*²⁰.

In his decision given on 27th November 1969 Sir Michael Rowe QC held that the decision in Pettitt's case¹⁹ covered the Shaw-Fox case and the main point raised in the Footitt case. There was, however, a subsidiary point raised in that case—namely, whether the compensation should be assessed on the footing that the landlords could have served a six weeks' notice under cl 1 (3) (a) of the lease. The tribunal decided that point against the landlords and held that in each case the interest to be valued was an interest in fee simple in agricultural land subject to an annual agricultural tenancy in respect of which at the date of the notice to treat the claimant was entitled to give an effective notice to quit on Lady Day 1968.

The board appealed from that decision to the Court of Appeal¹ and the Footitts cross-appealed on the question of the length of notice which they could have given. On the board's appeal what may be called the *Pointe Gourde*²⁰ point was covered by the previous decision of the court in the Pettitt case¹⁹. Counsel for the board, however, argued the point which had not been argued for the acquiring authority in that case

- a* —namely, that on the true construction of the Act the landlords could not have served notices to quit which did not require the consent of the Minister. The Court of Appeal rejected that argument. On the cross-appeal, however, the court held, although Cairns LJ felt grave doubts on the point, that cl 1 (3) (a) of the lease applied and that in that case compensation must be assessed on the basis that only a six-weeks' notice would have been needed.
- b* It is at first sight puzzling that the answer to the question which arose in Pettitt's case² and has arisen in this case should concern the acquiring authority at all. One would think that the aggregate of the sums to be paid by it to landlord and tenant for their respective interests in the land would be the same whether the tenant had only a tenancy determinable on six months' notice or had a tenancy enjoying statutory protection. The cake provided by the authority would be the same although
- c* in the former case the tenant would get a smaller and in the latter a larger share of it. We were told, however, that in practice as a matter of valuation the aggregate of the sums payable to landlord and tenant would almost certainly not be the same in each case. It would not, that is to say, follow that because, as has been agreed in the Shaw-Fox case, the landlord's interest will be worth £12,000 more if a six months' notice could have been given, the interest of the tenant would be worth £12,000 more if he had statutory protection. Again a further—and probably more important
- d* —reason for the concern of the acquiring authority in the question is that the compensation to be paid to landlord and tenant respectively is not determined at the same time in proceedings or negotiations to which both are parties but is fixed separately. Thus we were told that in this case the board had by agreement with the tenants acquired their interests on the basis now laid down by s 42 of the Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1968—although that section did not in fact apply here.
- e* Under that section the interest of the tenant must now be valued on the footing that he had no statutory protection; but although it has acquired the interest of the tenant on the basis that it was unprotected—that is to say that the *Pettitt*² decision was right—the board says as against the landlord that the *Pettitt*² decision was wrong and that the landlord's interest must be valued as though the tenant had
- f* statutory protection. If they succeed in this appeal it must follow—as indeed counsel for the board readily conceded—that an acquiring authority will pay substantially less for land subject to an agricultural tenancy than for identical land which is being farmed by an owner in fee simple.

I turn now to consider the question of construction of the relevant provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948. It could not, of course, be suggested that s 24 (2) and s 31 (1) only apply when the landlord is proposing himself to put the land in question to some non-agricultural use. They must obviously also apply to the common case where the landlord is in negotiation with a developer with the necessary planning permission and proposes to sell or let the land to him with vacant possession when he has got rid of the tenant. What was submitted on behalf of the board was that although it is true that the land was 'required' by them for a reservoir the use of the words 'on the ground that' in s 24 (2) and 'with a view to' in s 31 (1) showed that they only applied to notices to quit the giving of which was necessary in order to enable the intended non-agricultural use to be achieved and that they did not apply to a case like this where the board was serving independent notices to treat on the tenants and could get possession of the land needed without any action by the landlord. In support of his submission counsel referred to several other sections in the Act. One of them—s 25 (1) (e)—does not appear to me to throw any light on the problem. But ss 33 and 60, each of which provides, inter alia, that certain consequences shall ensue if the landlord 'resumes possession' of part of the holding by virtue of s 31 (1), certainly tend to support counsel's argument.

In all probability the draftsman of the 1948 Act had not this particular problem in mind at all and it is this fact that makes the question of construction to my mind a difficult one. There is, as I see it, nothing in s 24 (2) itself which supports the argument of the board. When once the board had obtained planning permission the landlord could, as I see it, properly say that he was serving the notice 'on the ground that' (ie 'because') the board required to use the land as a reservoir even though the serving of the notice would not itself be necessary for that result to be achieved. But ss 24 (2) and 31 (1) must be read so as to be consistent with one another and the use of the words 'with a view to'—not 'in view of'—in s 31 (1) certainly suggests that the serving of the notice is necessary to the achievement of the non-agricultural use and this reading receives some support from ss 33 and 60—although, of course, the landlord will on any footing normally resume possession after the service of a notice under s 31 (1) and one cannot deduce from those sections that he must always do so. So, as I see it, some strain has to be put either on the wording of s 24 (2) or on the wording of s 31 (1) in order to produce consistency between them in circumstances unforeseen by the draftsman. I ask myself then which reading produces the fairest and most reasonable result. I have no doubt that it is the reading favoured by the landlord. The general scheme of the Act is that the tenant is to have statutory protection so long as the land is being used as agricultural land but that if it is no longer to be so used the parties once more have the rights given them by the common law as modified by the tenancy agreement. If the landlord can serve an effective notice to quit when a private developer to whom he is willing to sell the land obtains planning permission why should he not be entitled to serve a similar notice when a public authority who can and probably will invoke compulsory powers obtains planning permission? As counsel for the landlords pointed out one can readily envisage a case where the authority after serving a notice to treat on the landlord enters into an agreement with him for the acquisition of the land which provides for the landlord getting rid of the tenant by serving the necessary notice to quit. In such a case there could be no doubt that the landlord could serve effective notice under ss 24 (2) and 31(1). It would be truly remarkable if his ability to serve effective notices depended on whether or not the authority was going to serve a notice to treat on the tenant as well as on the landlord. For these reasons I think that the Court of Appeal³ was right to reject the board's arguments on the construction of the Act.

I turn now to the argument founded on the so-called *Pointe Gourde*⁴ principle. The earliest reported statements of that principle are, it appears, to be found in the judgments of Grove and Stephen JJ in the case of Re Countess Ossalinsky and Manchester Corp'n decided in 1883 and reported under the heading 'Special Adaptability' in an appendix to Browne and Allan's *Law of Compensation*⁵. The principle, as there stated, amounts, as I understand it, to this. You may take into consideration in assessing compensation any likelihood that the land in question—by reason of its situation or physical features—would in the natural course of events come to be required for some purpose which would give it a greater value than it has at present simply as agricultural land. But you must remember that what you are concerned with is the value of the land to the owner not its value to the acquiring authority. Consequently you must not take into account the special need for the land which the authority has and which moved it to obtain compulsory powers. That would be in effect to make it pay for those powers.

The facts in the Pointe Gourde case⁴ itself were that the Crown had compulsorily acquired certain lands owned by the company so that they could be used by the United States authorities in connection with the establishment of a naval base in Trinidad. On part of the land there was a large quantity of limestone which before the acquisition the company had quarried and sold. The compensation tribunal found (1) that the land had a special suitability or adaptability for the purpose of

5 (2nd Edn) p 659

- a producing and marketing quarry products and had a market value as quarry land prior to the date of acquisition and (2) that the United States had a special need of a large quantity of stone for the construction of the naval base and so, over and above the special adaptability of the land referred to in (1) its proximity to the base made it specially suited to the United States' special needs. The tribunal awarded $15,000 compensation to cover the matters set out in (2) but the Privy Council held that
- b that item of compensation must be disallowed because it was well settled that compensation for the compulsory acquisition of land should not include an increase in value which was entirely due to the scheme underlying the acquisition. That decision appears to me to be entirely in accord with and not to be in any way an extension of the principle as stated in the Ossalinsky case⁶. Counsel for the board referred us to a number of other cases, some decided before and others after the Pointe Gourde case⁷, in which the principle has been applied; but although the
- c language used by the judges is not always exactly the same I cannot for myself see that the principle has with the passage of time become any wider than it was in 1883. The way in which counsel sought to invoke the principle in this case was as follows.

- d 'The obtaining of planning permission was a necessary part of the board's scheme for the construction of a reservoir; but for the obtaining of the planning permission the landlord would not have been able to serve an effective notice to quit; to give him anything in respect of his ability to serve such a notice could be to compensate him for an increase in value which is due to the scheme.'

- To my mind that train of reasoning confuses the nature of the landlord's interest with its value. No one suggests that the sum of £27,200 which it is agreed is the value
- e of the Shaw-Fox reversion if the landlord could serve an effective notice contains any element which infringes the *Pointe Gourde*⁷ principle. That principle is being invoked here in order to induce the court to say that the landlord's interest in the land—which is what has to be valued under s 7 of the 1965 Act—is not what in truth it was, if the board are wrong on construction, but something quite different.
- f As Russell LJ said in the Pettitt case⁸, the *Pointe Gourde*⁷ principle as hitherto understood does not affect the ascertainment of the interest to be valued but only its value when ascertained. To accede to the board's submission on this point would involve an extension of the principle to which I would hesitate to agree, even if it seemed desirable in order to achieve justice between the parties; but for the reasons which I have already given on the construction point I do not think that there would be any injustice to the tenant—let alone that there would be any injustice to the board—
- g in allowing the landlord to be paid the value of the reversion assessed on the footing that he could serve an effective notice to quit.

- It remains to consider the subsidiary question whether the Footitts could at the date of the notice to treat served on them have served a six weeks' notice to quit on their tenant under s 23 (1) of the 1948 Act. The answer to that question depends on the construction of cl 1 (3) of the lease of 12th August 1949 which came to form one of
- h the terms of the annual tenancy on which the tenant held over after the expiry of that lease. That clause which must be construed contra proferentem appears to me to envisage a notice given to enable the landlord to resume possession of land of which he requires possession so that it may be put to a non-agricultural use either by him or by someone whom he puts into possession of it. I do not think that the Footitts could have invoked it in the circumstances subsisting when the notice to treat
- i was served on them. On that minor point, therefore, I think that the decision of the Lands Tribunal was right and the doubts of Cairns LJ justified and I would allow that appeal.

CHANCERY DIVISION

18th, 19th, 20th, 31ST JANUARY 1972

Bankruptcy – Trustee in bankruptcy – Payment into account with Bank of England – Bank account with local bank – Grounds for authorising payments into account with local bank – Probable size of the cash balance – Any other reason for the advantage of the creditors – Purpose of having account with local bank to earn interest for benefit of creditors – Cash balance of £36,000 paid into bankruptcy estates account – Application by committee of inspection to Department of Trade and Industry to authorise payment into local bank account – Refusal on ground that purpose of earning interest not a proper reason for authorisation – ‘Probable size of the cash balance’ a reference to small amounts not large – ‘Any other reason’ not including earning of interest – Bankruptcy Act 1914, s 89 (2), proviso (a).

The deceased died leaving a gross estate of some £71,000 and a nil net estate. It subsequently appeared that the deceased's estate was insolvent and an administration order in bankruptcy of the estate was made. The trustee of the deceased debtor's property paid £36,000 into the bankruptcy estates account with the Bank of England, where it had since remained. The deceased's tax affairs were in confusion at his death and the trustee was engaged in lengthy negotiations with the Inland Revenue and Estate Duty Office. As it appeared that the cash balance of £36,000 could not be distributed for a considerable period because of the difficulties in finding out the total liabilities, the committee of inspection applied to the Department of Trade and Industry ('the department') under s 89 (2)^a of the Bankruptcy Act 1914 to authorise the trustee to open an account with a local bank so that the £36,000 could earn interest for the benefit of creditors. The department refused, having been advised that it had no power under s 89 (2), proviso (a), to give the necessary authorisation where the sole purpose of having an account at a local bank was to earn interest. The trustee applied to the court for declarations (i) that, it appearing to the committee of inspection that, because of the probable amount of the cash balance, the trustee should have an account with the local bank, the department was not entitled under s 89 (2), proviso (a), to decline to authorise the trustee to open an account with a local bank; (ii) alternatively, that the obtaining of interest for the advantage of the creditors came within the words 'for any other reason' in s 89 (2), proviso (a), and was therefore a proper ground whereon the department might be satisfied that the trustee should have an account with a local bank.

Held – The declarations sought would not be made for the following reasons—

(i) the words 'probable amount of the cash balance' in s 89 (2), proviso (a), referred to small amounts rather than large; accordingly the fact that the cash balance was a large one was not a valid ground on which the department could be required to authorise an account with the local bank (see p 1103 j to p 1104 a, post);

(ii) although the words 'for any other reason' were prima facie very wide, to give

- a them a wide meaning so as to include the earning of interest as a proper reason would be to negative the whole basis of the 1914 Act which was that the costs of the department were to be defrayed from the fees and dividends arising from the investment of moneys in the bankruptcy estates account; accordingly the 'other reason' must be one which was advantageous because the account was a local one as opposed to one with the Bank of England, and advantageous in the sense that it would permit the bankruptcy to be more easily administered (see p 1104 d and g, post).

Motion

- By notice of motion dated 25th October 1971 Bernard Phillips, the trustee in bankruptcy of the property of Raymond Neville Walker (deceased) who had died on 5th September 1964, sought the following relief, namely (i) a declaration that, it
 e appearing to the committee of inspection in the bankruptcy that, because of the probable amount of the cash balance, the trustee in bankruptcy of the estate should have an account with a local bank, the Department of Trade and Industry was not entitled to decline to authorise the trustee in bankruptcy to make his payments into and out of Lloyds Bank Ltd, 190 Great Portland Street, London W 1, being a local bank selected by the committee of inspection; further, or in the alternative,
 f (ii) a declaration that the obtaining of interest for the advantage of the creditors of the estate was a proper ground (or alternatively was by itself a proper ground) whereon the Department of Trade and Industry might be satisfied that the trustee in bankruptcy should have an account with a local bank. The facts are set out in the judgment.

Cur adv vult

- 31st January. FOSTER J read the following judgment. By this motion two questions are raised, both concerning the construction of proviso (a) to s 89 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914, and both concerning the circumstances in which a trustee in h bankruptcy may have a bank account in a bank other than the Bank of England.

The facts

- Raymond Neville Walker died on 5th September 1964 leaving a gross estate of some £71,000 and a nil net estate. Probate was granted to his executors on 28th October 1964. It soon appeared that the estate was hopelessly insolvent, and on 14th March 1966 an administration order in bankruptcy of his estate was made in the i Guildford County Court; and on 30th June 1966 Mr Bernard Phillips was appointed the trustee of the property of the deceased debtor. In August 1966 the trustee paid into the bankruptcy estates account with the Bank of England a sum of £36,000, and since that date the amount has never been less and may have increased somewhat.

In order that the questions which now face me could be decided in the High Court, this court, on 2nd November 1970, ordered that the bankruptcy proceedings should be transferred from the county court to the High Court. On 6th September 1971 a the committee of inspection requested the Department of Trade and Industry (as the former Board of Trade is now known) to permit the trustee to open a bank account, the sole reason being that the sum of £36,000 could earn interest for the benefit of the creditors. The reason for this was that the deceased debtor's tax affairs were in a muddle, and that negotiations with the Inland Revenue and the Estate Duty Office were bound to be lengthy and difficult. The department, however, b refused this permission, not on the facts of the case but because it had been advised that it had no power to do so if the sole purpose of having an account at a local bank was the earning of interest. It appears that if the earning of interest is as a matter of law a valid consideration, the department would have acceded to the application in all the circumstances of the present case.

The questions

Section 89 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act 1914 is in these terms: c

'Every trustee in bankruptcy shall, in such manner and at such times as the Board of Trade with the concurrence of the Treasury direct, pay the money received by him to the Bankruptcy Estates Account at the Bank of England, and the Board of Trade shall furnish him with a certificate of receipt of the money so paid. Provided that—(a) if it appears to the committee of inspection that, for the purpose of carrying on the debtor's business or of obtaining advances, or because of the probable amount of the cash balance, or if the committee shall satisfy the Board of Trade that for any other reason it is for the advantage of the creditors that the trustee should have an account with a local bank, the Board of Trade shall, on the application of the committee of inspection, authorise the trustee to make his payments into and out of such local bank as the committee may select . . .'

In proviso (a) to that subsection there are four possible instances, the first three being decisions of the committee of inspection and the fourth being to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade. They are as follows: (1) for the purpose of carrying on a debtor's business; (2) for the purpose of obtaining advances; (3) because of the probable amount of the cash balance; (4) if for any other reason it is for the advantage f of the creditors. The first and second instances do not arise in the present case as there is no business to carry on and there is no question of obtaining advances. The two questions which arise under the third and fourth heads can be posed as follows: first, if it appears to the committee of inspection that the cash balance of £36,000 or more cannot be distributed for a considerable period because of the difficulties in finding out the total liabilities and that the trustee in bankruptcy should have a local account so that the sum can earn interest for the benefit of the creditors, can the committee request the department to authorise a local bank account, the department being bound to give its permission? Secondly, if the committee cannot request the department under the first question, and yet if it satisfies the department that the obtaining of interest comes within the phrase 'any other reason . . . for the advantage g of the creditors', is the obtaining of interest another reason for the department to authorise such an account? h

Concessions by the department

During the course of the hearing certain concessions were made by the department, in these terms. First, where s 89 (2), proviso (a), provides: j

'if it appears to the committee of inspection that, for the purpose of carrying on the debtor's business or of obtaining advances, or because of the probable amount of the cash balance, . . . the trustee should have an account with a local bank, the Board of Trade shall, on the application of the committee of inspection, authorise the trustee'

- a* to have such an account, and the Board of Trade receives an application in due form certifying that in the opinion of the committee of inspection the trustee should for one of the aforesaid purposes have such an account, the Board of Trade is required to authorise the trustee to have such an account unless it is not satisfied that the purpose for such an account is one authorised by statute and that the opinion expressed by the committee of inspection is an opinion which such a committee, properly instructed as to the law and the relevant facts, could reasonably hold. Secondly, where the section provides:

‘... if the committee shall satisfy the Board of Trade that for any other reason it is for the advantage of the creditors that the trustee should have an account’,

- and the Board of Trade receives an application in due form setting out the matters alleged to constitute such ‘other reason’, the Board of Trade is the arbiter whether or not such application should be granted, and its decision can be impeached if, but only if, it is shown that it was founded on a misapprehension of the law or is one which no reasonable person, properly instructed as to the law and giving due consideration to the matters advanced, could arrive at.

d History of the bankruptcy legislation

- The first statute to which I was referred is the Bankruptcy Act 1825¹. By s 12 of that Act application could be made to the Lord Chancellor for the appointment of commissioners to administer the bankrupt’s estate, and it was the commissioners who adjudged a person bankrupt (see ss 22 and 24). By s 61 the creditors chose assignees, and the estate of the bankrupt was conveyed to them by ss 63 and 64; and the conduct of the bankruptcy was in the hands of the creditors (see s 88).
- e* By s 103 the commissioners might ‘as often as it shall appear to them expedient for the Bankrupt’s Estate’ direct any money to be invested in exchequer bills for the benefit of the creditors. It is I think clear that under the provisions of the 1825 Act the creditors had the full control of the bankrupt’s estate. This turned out to be unsatisfactory, and led to the passing of Lord Brougham’s Act in 1831². This Act introduced a system of official administration by creating official assignees who acted in addition to the creditor’s assignees, but this Act applied only in London. However, a further Act was passed in 1842³ extending the appointment of official assignees over the whole country.
- f*

- In 1849 the Bankruptcy Law Consolidation Act⁴ was passed, which confirmed the position of the official assignee. The sections in this Act which are relevant are as follows. Section 31 provided that the accountant in bankruptcy should control the care and management of the funds belonging to bankrupt estates. Section 33 provided that there should be two accounts at the Bank of England, one called ‘the Bankruptcy Fund Account’ and the other ‘the Chief Registrar’s Account’. Section 34 permitted the sums to be invested and that the interest and dividends on such securities should be put in the latter account. Section 39 directed that one official assignee should be appointed who received the bankrupt’s estate and paid it into the Bank of England to the credit of the accountant in bankruptcy. Section 56 provided that the salaries of the commissioners and other officers should be paid out of the chief registrar’s account. Section 186 is, however, the most important section, and I will read it:
- g*
- h*

- ‘That the Court may, as often as it shall appear expedient for the Bankrupt’s Estate, direct any Money, Part of such Estate, to be invested in the Purchase of Exchequer Bills, for the Benefit of the Creditors, and may direct where and with whom such Exchequer Bills shall be kept, and cause such Exchequer Bills to be sold when it shall appear to such Court expedient, and may direct the Proceeds thereof to be again laid out in the Purchase of Exchequer Bills, or to be applied for the Benefit of the Creditors, the making of any such Purchase or Sale to be subject to the Rules or Orders at any Time in force under this Act relating to the Purchase, Sale, or Transfer of Exchequer Bills by the Accountant in Bankruptcy.' a

This system of having official assignees and creditors' assignees did not work at all well, and as a consequence the Bankruptcy Act 1861 was passed. This was an amending Act, but s 186 was not repealed, and remained in force until 1869. The effect of the Act was to reduce very considerably the duties of the assignees. b

In 1869 two Acts were passed: first, the Bankruptcy Repeal and Insolvent Court Act 1869, which repealed all the provisions of the Acts of 1849 and 1861; and, secondly, the Bankruptcy Act 1869. The general effect of the latter Act was to abandon to a great extent any official participation and to revert to a voluntary system. It was a consolidating and amending Act, and the relevant sections are, first, s 20, which provides as follows: c

'The trustee shall, in the administration of the property of the bankrupt and in the distribution thereof amongst his creditors, have regard to any directions that may be given by resolution of the creditors at any general meeting, or by the committee of inspection, and any directions so given by the creditors at any general meeting shall be deemed to override any directions given by the committee of inspection; the trustee shall call a meeting of the committee of inspection once at least every three months, when they shall audit his accounts, and determine whether any or what dividend is to be paid; he may also call special meetings of the said committee as he thinks necessary. Subject to the provisions of this Act, and to such directions as aforesaid, the trustee shall exercise his own discretion in the management of the estate, and its distribution amongst the creditors. The trustee may from time to time summon general meetings of the creditors for the purpose of ascertaining their wishes; he may also apply to the Court, in manner prescribed, for directions in relation to any particular matter arising under the bankruptcy...' d

Section 25 gave the trustee very wide powers, and by s 26 it was provided: e

'The trustee may appoint the bankrupt himself to superintend the management of the property or of any part thereof, or to carry on the trade of the bankrupt (if any) for the benefit of the creditors, and in any other respect to aid in administering the property in such manner and on such terms as the creditors direct.' f

By s 30 it was provided: g

'The trustee shall pay all sums from time to time received by him into such bank as the majority of the creditors in number and value at any general meeting shall appoint, and failing such appointment into the Bank of England; and if he at any time keep in his hands any sum exceeding fifty pounds for more than ten days he shall be subject to the following liabilities; that is to say, (1) He shall pay interest at the rate of twenty pounds per centum per annum on the excess of such sum above fifty pounds as he may retain in his hands: (2) Unless he can prove to the satisfaction of the Court that his reason for retaining the money was sufficient, he shall, on the application of any creditor, be dismissed from his office by the Court, and shall have no claim for remuneration, and be liable to any expenses to which the creditors may be put by or in consequence of his dismissal.' h

Under this Act, general rules were made both in 1870 and in 1871, and it is I think clear that any interest on money in the bank enured for the benefit of the creditors (see particularly form 104 of the appendix to the 1870 rules). j

- a* However, this voluntary system again proved unsatisfactory, and in 1883 Parliament decided to bring in a government department to supervise bankruptcies and to return the jurisdiction of officialdom. This led to the Bankruptcy Act 1883. This Act is the forerunner of the 1914 Act, with which I am concerned, and the particular sections are almost identical in each case. A comparison is given below: s 74 (3) of the 1883 Act is equivalent to s 89 (2) of the 1914 Act without the provisos; the first paragraph of s 74 (4) of the 1883 Act is equivalent to proviso (a) to s 89 (2) of the 1914 Act; the last two paragraphs of s 74 (4) of the 1883 Act are equivalent to s 89 (3) of the 1914 Act; s 74 (5) is equivalent to s 89 (4); s 74 (6) is equivalent to s 89 (5), s 74 (7) to s 89 (6), s 76 (1) to s 90 (1), s 76 (2) to s 90 (2), s 76 (3) to s 90 (5) and s 77 to s 91. The differences are so small that the answers to the questions of construction before me apply, in my judgment, equally to both these Acts. I shall consider them in more detail later, but it is to be noticed that there are no provisions in either Act specifically permitting investments of surplus funds, the dividends enuring for the benefit of creditors, or for allowing any interest on surplus funds, except where there is a local bank account.

Company legislation

- d* The development of the law in regard to company liquidation was later in time than that of bankruptcy law, but followed with one notable exception the pattern of the bankruptcy law. In 1890 the Companies (Winding Up) Act was passed. Section 11 is clearly based on the provisions of s 74 of the 1883 Act. It is in these terms:

- e* '(1) An account, called the Companies Liquidation Account, shall be kept by the Board of Trade with the Bank of England, and all moneys received by the Board of Trade in respect of proceedings under this Act shall be paid to that account.

- f* (2) Every liquidator of a company which is being wound up by order of the court shall, in such manner and at such times as the Board of Trade, with the concurrence of the Treasury, direct, pay the money received by him to the Companies Liquidation Account at the Bank of England, and the Board of Trade shall furnish him with a certificate of receipt of the money so paid.

- g* (3) Provided that, if the committee of inspection satisfy the Board of Trade that for the purpose of carrying on the business of the company or of obtaining advances, or for any other reason, it is for the advantage of the creditors or contributories that the liquidator should have an account with any other bank, the Board of Trade shall, on the application of the committee of inspection, authorise the liquidator to make his payments into and out of such other bank as the committee may select, and thereupon those payments shall be made in the prescribed manner.'

Subsection (4) is the same penal provision as is found in the Bankruptcy Act. Section 11 continues:

- h* '(5) All payments out of money standing to the credit of the Board of Trade in the Companies Liquidation Account shall be made by the Bank of England in the prescribed manner.

'(6) No liquidator of a company which is being wound up by order of the court shall pay any sums received by him as liquidator into his private banking account.'

- j* It is to be noticed that the expression 'or because of the probable amount of the cash balance' is omitted from s 11 (3).

Section 16, which I will read, follows closely s 76 of the 1883 Act, and is in these terms:

'(1) Whenever the cash balance standing to the credit of the Companies Liquidation Account is in excess of the amount which in the opinion of the Board of Trade is required for the time being to answer demands in respect of companies' estates, the Board of Trade shall notify the same to the Treasury, and shall pay over the same or any part thereof, as the Treasury may require, to the Treasury, to such account as the Treasury may direct, and the Treasury may invest the said sums, or any part thereof, in Government securities, to be placed to the credit of the said account. a

'(2) Whenever any part of the money so invested is, in the opinion of the Board of Trade, required to answer any demands in respect of companies' estates, the Board of Trade shall notify to the Treasury the amount so required, and the Treasury shall thereupon repay to the Board of Trade such sum as may be required to the credit of the Companies Liquidation Account, and for that purpose may direct the sale of such part of the said securities as may be necessary. b

'(3) The dividends on the investments under this section shall be paid to such account as the Treasury may direct, and regard shall be had to the amount thus derived in fixing the fees payable in respect of proceedings in the winding up of companies.' c

However, there is a marked addition in ss 17 and 18 of that Act. Thus s 17 permits investment and the company being credited with the dividends, and s 18 permits interest being allowed on certain surplus funds over £2,000. These provisions have continued in company legislation, being found in the Companies (Consolidation) Act 1908 and the Companies Act 1929 and now are embodied in ss 48, 361 and 362 of the Companies Act 1948. d

Other bankruptcy legislation

I was also referred to the Bankruptcy (Office Accommodation) Acts of 1885 and 1886, to the Economy (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1926 and to the Insolvency Services (Accounting and Investment) Act 1970. By the latter two Acts the bankruptcy estates account and the companies liquidation account were amalgamated. Section 4 of the 1970 Act provides as follows: e

'Where under section 362 (4) of the Companies Act 1948 (investment of surplus balances) a company has become entitled to any sum by way of interest the Board of Trade shall certify that sum and the amount of tax payable on it to the National Debt Commissioners and the Commissioners shall pay, out of the Investment Account,—(a) into the Companies Liquidation Account, the sum so certified less the amount of tax so certified; and (b) to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, the amount of tax so certified.' f

Section 8 of the 1970 Act amended s 90 of the Bankruptcy Act 1914 in the terms set out in the schedule. In my judgment, however, I derive little assistance on the construction questions before me from the other Bankruptcy Acts, as the policy since the earliest date in bankruptcy has swung to and away from officialdom, interest being allowed when it was in the hands of the trustee without official representation, but interest not being allowed when officialdom entered. g

In construing this Act, one must bear in mind that ss 89 and 90 are based on similar sections in the 1883 Act, which I have mentioned. The provision in question, s 89 (2), proviso (a), I have already read. Section 89 (1) provides: h

'The Bankruptcy Estates Account shall continue to be kept by the Board of Trade with the Bank of England, and all moneys received by the Board of Trade in respect of proceedings under this Act shall be paid to that account.' i Proviso (b) to sub-s (2) is not relevant. Section 89 continues:

'(3) Where the trustee opens an account in a local bank, he shall open and keep it in the name of the debtor's estate, and any interest receivable in respect of

b '(4) Subject to any general rules relating to small bankruptcies under section one hundred and twenty-nine of this Act, where the debtor at the date of the receiving order has an account at a bank, such account shall not be withdrawn until the expiration of seven days from the day appointed for the first meeting of creditors, unless the Board of Trade, for the safety of the account, or other sufficient cause, order the withdrawal of the account.

c '(5) If a trustee at any time retains for more than ten days a sum exceeding fifty pounds, or such other amount as the Board of Trade in any particular case authorise him to retain, then unless he explains the retention to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade, he shall pay interest on the amount so retained in excess at the rate of twenty per centum per annum, and shall have no claim to remuneration, and may be removed from his office by the Board of Trade and shall be liable to pay any expenses occasioned by reason of his default.

'(6) All payments out of money standing to the credit of the Board of Trade in the Bankruptcy Estates Account shall be made by the Bank of England in the prescribed manner.'

d Section 90 provides:

e '(1) Whenever the cash balance standing to the credit of the Bankruptcy Estates Account is in excess of the amount which in the opinion of the Board of Trade is required for the time being to answer demands in respect of bankrupts' estates, the Board of Trade shall notify the same to the Treasury, and shall pay over the same or any part thereof as the Treasury may require to the Treasury, to such account as the Treasury may direct, and the Treasury may invest the said sums or any part thereof in Government securities to be placed to the credit of the said account.

f '(2) Whenever any part of the money so invested is, in the opinion of the Board of Trade, required to answer any demands in respect of bankrupts' estates, the Board of Trade shall notify to the Treasury the amount so required, and the Treasury shall thereupon repay to the Board of Trade such sum as may be required to the credit of the Bankruptcy Estates Account, and for that purpose may direct the sale of such part of the said securities as may be necessary.

g '(3) The Treasury, out of any sums so paid to them, may pay such sums as they consider necessary for defraying the expenses of providing office accommodation for any officer performing duties under this Act...

h Proviso (a) to s 89 (2), as I have said, can be split into four parts, and I am not concerned with the first two parts, but only with the third and fourth.

The first question

j It is curious that the Act does not say whether the probable amount of the cash balance is because the amount is large or because it is small. In 1883 it is likely that the legislature thought that the Bank of England was the safest place for the moneys, and that local banks might be risky and liable to insolvency. But when one remembers that the scheme is that the dividends on the investments were to be used to defray the expenses and charges of the Board of Trade and that the fees were to be fixed, having regard to the dividends to be received, it is unlikely that the legislature intended that large cash balances should not remain in the bankruptcy estates account at the Bank of England. In my judgment, where the legislature used the words 'probable amount of the cash balance' it was referring to small amounts rather than large. If the amounts were small, the risk of them being in a local bank could be faced and the inconvenience of having small sums in the Bank of England avoided. a

The second question

The words which I have to construe are:

‘... if the committee shall satisfy the Board of Trade that for any other reason it is for the advantage of the creditors that the trustee should have an account with a local bank...’ b

In my judgment, the submission on behalf of the trustee of the property of the deceased debtor that the obtaining of interest can be a proper reason fails to give any weight to the word ‘local bank’. If it succeeds, the whole framework of s 89—that is, the payment into an account with the Bank of England—would be vitiated, since every balance, however small, would be transferred to a local account to earn interest. c Further, in the companies legislation the provisions for interest would be otiose if interest could be acquired, and at a higher rate, through another bank account by virtue of the words ‘any other reason’ in s 248 (1) of the Companies Act 1948. It seems to me that the other reason must be one which is advantageous because the account is a local one as opposed to one with the Bank of England, and advantageous in the sense that it will permit the bankruptcy to be more easily administered. d The fact that, once a local bank account has been obtained, interest enures for the benefit of the creditor is, in my judgment, a result of obtaining it and not a reason for it.

Counsel for the trustee relied on the case of *Re Sims, ex parte Official Receiver*³, in which it was decided that the penal interest chargeable against a trustee in bankruptcy under s 74 (6) of the 1883 Act is payable to the bankrupt’s estate and not to the Treasury. e The basis of that decision was that there was a presumption that the trustee had improperly made a profit out of the money which he had retained, and that profit was money which he received to the use of the estate. I do not think that the case assists one way or the other except that it shows that interest can accrue to the estate otherwise than under s 89 (3) of the 1914 Act.

Conclusion f

It is of course true that the meaning of the words ‘for any other reason’ is prima facie very wide indeed, but to accede to the trustee’s submission would in my judgment be to negative the whole basis of the 1883 and 1914 Acts that the costs of the Board of Trade were to be defrayed from the fees and dividends arising from the investment of moneys in the bankruptcy estates account. Such a result can be avoided by limiting the meaning of the words as I have suggested, with the result that in my judgment the obtaining of interest is not in itself a reason for opening a local bank account. g

Costs – Compulsory winding-up – Insurance company – Unsuccessful motion to discharge appointment of provisional liquidator – Power of company to instruct solicitors – Residuary power.

The Department of Trade and Industry ('the department'), pursuant to s 109 of the Companies Act 1967, required a motor insurance company ('the company') to produce its books and papers. The department also served on the company a notice under s 80 of the 1967 Act imposing on the company certain requirements on the grounds that there was a risk of the company becoming insolvent. Then, having given the company the requisite notice, the department gave it a direction under s 68 (1) of the 1967 Act forbidding the writing of new policies or the renewal of expiring policies. Subsequently the department presented a petition under s 35 of the 1967 Act and s 13 of the Insurance Companies Act 1958 to have the company wound up. The registrar forthwith made an order on an ex parte application by the department appointing an official receiver provisional liquidator of the company. By virtue of the order the provisional liquidator's powers were limited and restricted 'to taking possession of collecting and protecting the assets of the . . . company . . . such assets . . . not to be distributed or parted with until further order'. The day after his appointment the provisional liquidator applied ex parte for the appointment of a special manager. An order was made appointing W special manager. The order provided that the provisional liquidator 'be at liberty to employ and out of the assets of the . . . Company to pay such of the clerks servants and employees of the . . . Company as he may consider necessary to assist the . . . Special Manager'. W, with the concurrence of the provisional liquidator, closed down the company's Bradford branch office and dismissed the staff. The company instructed their solicitors to seek (i) an order discharging the appointments of the provisional liquidator and the special manager on the grounds that the court, under s 238^a of the Companies Act 1948, could only appoint a provisional liquidator where special circumstances (such as danger to assets, proof of insolvency or an undefended petition) existed and no such special circumstances applied in relation to the company; (ii) alternatively, injunctions restraining the provisional liquidator from acting otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the order appointing him, and the special manager from carrying on the business of the company otherwise than with a view to the preservation of its assets including goodwill until the hearing of the winding-up petition.

Held – (1) The power to appoint a provisional liquidator conferred on the court by s 238 of the 1948 Act was not limited to cases where such special circumstances a Section 238, so far as material, provides: '(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, the court may appoint a liquidator provisionally at any time after the presentation of a winding-up petition. (2) . . . the appointment of a provisional liquidator may be made at any time before the making of a winding-up order . . . (4) Where a liquidator is provisionally appointed by the court, the court may limit and restrict his powers by the order appointing him.'

existed; other factors, such as the public interest, might be taken into account; in the present case the public interest required that the solvency of the company should be maintained or the company wound up before its liabilities exceeded its assets; that solvency depended to an important extent on the company recovering from its brokers and agents the balances which they held; the evidence showed that it was essential that continuous pressure should be maintained on such agents to remit the sums to the company; the appointment of a provisional liquidator, clothed with the necessary authority to collect those assets, was in the circumstances necessary; accordingly no order would be made discharging his appointment or that of the special manager (see p 1109 g to j, p 1110 h and p 1111 b and e to g, post).

(2) The injunctions sought would not be granted for the following reasons—

(i) the provisional liquidator was acting within the powers conferred on him in allowing the branch office to be closed and the staff dismissed (see p 1112 a and b, post),

(ii) it was the duty of the provisional liquidator to protect the company's assets; the reduction of the company's liabilities was a correlative of the protection of its assets; on the evidence the usefulness of the branch office had gone once new insurance business or the renewal of existing policies of insurance was forbidden under s 68, and the office had become unprofitable; accordingly the closure of the Bradford office was a sensible and proper step for the special manager, with the concurrence of the provisional liquidator, to take (see p 1112 c and j, post).

(3) The solicitors acting for the company would not be liable to pay the costs of the motion personally; they were acting with the authority of the board for, notwithstanding the appointment of the provisional liquidator and the general assumption by him of its powers, the board still retained certain residuary powers, which included authority to instruct solicitors and counsel in such circumstances (see p 1113 c d and f, post).

Motion

This was a motion by the Union Accident Insurance Co Ltd ('the company') for (1) an order discharging the appointment of the official receiver as the provisional liquidator of the company under an order made on 22nd November 1971, on an ex parte application by the Department of Trade and Industry ('the department'), and continued over the adjourned hearing of the summons on 30th November 1971, and (2) an order discharging the appointment of Gerhard Adolph Weiss as special manager of the company under an order made ex parte on 23rd November 1971, or a alternatively, (3) an injunction restraining the official receiver from acting whether by himself, his servants, agents or howsoever otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the order, and (4) an injunction restraining the special manager from carrying on the business of the company otherwise than with a view to the preservation of its assets including goodwill until the hearing of the petition, presented by the department, for the winding-up of the company. The facts are set out in the judgment.

c PLOWMAN J. This is a motion for an order discharging the appointment of the official receiver as the provisional liquidator of the company, Union Accident Insurance Co Ltd, and of Mr Weiss as special manager of the company, and for certain alternative relief by way of injunction.

The events leading up to the application are these. The company was incorporated on 30th December 1965 under the name Southern Counties Insurance Co Ltd, which was changed to its present name on 19th February 1968. The company has an issued capital of £400,000 and its business is that of motor vehicle insurance. It is said to have about 43,000 policy holders. In September 1968 the company passed into the control of a Mr Pittalis who is the chairman and the majority shareholder. At that time the Board of Trade, as it then was, had, in pursuance of its statutory powers, imposed on the company the requirement to submit quarterly accounts in addition to its annual audited accounts. On 22nd March 1971, pursuant to s 109 of the Companies Act 1967, the Department of Trade and Industry, which I will call 'the department', authorised Mr Woodman and Mr Knight, of its insurance and companies department, to require the company to produce books and papers, and that was done. On 21st May 1971 the department served on the company a notice pursuant to s 80 of the 1967 Act imposing on the company certain other requirements. That section is one authorising the department to impose requirements if it appears that the business of an insurance company, to which the Insurance Companies Act 1958 applies, is being so conducted that there is a risk of the company becoming insolvent. The requirements in question, so far as material, are set out in para 7 of the winding-up petition, to which I will refer in a moment, and were as follows;

g '(1) The Company should not thenceforth make investments of the following descriptions, that is to say, (a) loans and debentures, (b) the purchase of land or any interest in land, (c) shares in a company whose principal objects or activities included the purchase or development of land. (2) The Company should within three months after the date of the Notice (or such longer period as [the department] might allow) realise investments which consisted of freehold or leasehold land held by the Company otherwise than by way of security for moneys owing to the Company. [No 4, which is the third one set out in the petition, states:] The Company should take all such steps as were requisite to secure that the aggregate of the premiums to be received by it in consideration of the undertaking by it, during the period of six months beginning on 1st July 1971, of liabilities in the course of carrying on motor vehicle insurance business should not exceed four hundred thousand pounds (£400,000) net of refunds, rebates and premiums for re-insurance ceded.'

j That last requirement was complied with. The land which the company was directed to realise within three months has not yet in fact been realised, but I understand that part of it is to be sold by auction in a few days and the remainder in January 1972.

On 1st October 1971 a further order as to the production of books and documents to Mr Woodman and Mr Knight was made under s 109 of the 1967 Act. On 8th October the department served on the company a notice required by s 68 (3) of the 1967 Act that it was considering exercising its powers under s 68 (1), and on 17th November 1971, pursuant to s 68 (1), the department, not being satisfied that the company had the required margin of solvency, gave a direction, the effect of which was that the company was forbidden to enter into or vary any contract of insurance with reference to motor insurance. The effect of that is that the company cannot now write any new policy or renew any expiring policy, and any contravention of that is a criminal offence under the Act.

On 22nd November 1971 the department presented a petition to have the company wound up. In that petition they rely on two statutory grounds. The first is s 35 of the 1967 Act which enables the department to petition if, as a result of information or documents obtained under s 109, it appears to the department 'that it is expedient in the public interest' that the company should be wound up. It is, I think, of importance to note that in that respect the department is made guardian of the public interest. The second statutory ground is s 13 of the Insurance Companies Act 1958, which provides that an insurance company shall be deemed for the purposes of s 222 of the Companies Act 1948 to be unable to pay its debts if the value of its assets does not exceed the amount of its liabilities by what is called the relevant amount. The relevant amount in this case is one-fifth of its premium income in its last preceding financial year; in other words, the department can petition if the company has not got the necessary margin of solvency and the power to petition in that event is conferred by s 15 (2) of the 1958 Act, as amended.

'From the information obtained under s 109 of the Companies Act 1967 it appears to [the department] expedient in the public interest that the Company should be wound up, in that:—(i) the Company has failed to realise investments which consist of freehold or leasehold land as required by Paragraph (2) of the Notice dated the 21st May 1971 within the period of three months specified in the said Paragraph or at all; [I have already referred to the matter of the forthcoming auction.] (ii) there are circumstances suggesting that the Company has seriously insufficient liquid resources to meet liabilities and is deliberately delaying the settlement of claims; [it cannot I think seriously be disputed that the company is short of liquid resources.] (iii) on the 31st March 1971, despite the problem of liquidity the Company made an unsecured loan of £13,000 to Presto Bars Limited, a Company then under the control of the wife of Mr Pittalis, the Company's Chairman; [that is not denied, although the loan is now I understand secured.] (iv) there are circumstances suggesting that the Company has been seriously underestimating outstanding claims.'

Then in regard to the second ground, namely, s 13 of the 1958 Act, the petition states:

'10. The value of the Company's assets does not exceed the amount of its liabilities (computed in accordance with section 13 (2) of the Insurance Companies Act, 1958) by the amount which is the relevant amount for the purposes of section 62 (1) (a) of the Companies Act 1967. 11. By reason of the circumstances aforesaid the Company is deemed for the purpose of Section 222 of the Companies Act, 1948, to be unable to pay its debts. [Paragraph 12 states:] In the premises, it is just and equitable that the Company should be wound up.'

On 22nd November 1971, the day on which the petition was presented, the registrar made an order on an ex parte application by the department appointing one of the official receivers attached to the court to be provisional liquidator of the company

- a until the conclusion of the adjourned hearing of the summons for the appointment of the provisional liquidator. The order contained the following paragraph:
- ‘And the court doth hereby limit and restrict the powers of the said Provisional Liquidator to the following acts, that is to say, to taking possession of collecting and protecting the assets of the above-named company but such assets are not to be distributed or parted with until further order.’
- b On the following day 23rd November, the provisional liquidator applied ex parte for the appointment of a special manager pursuant to s 263 of the Companies Act 1948, and Mr Weiss, a partner in the well-known firm of W H Cork Gully & Co, chartered accountants, was appointed special manager until the conclusion of the hearing of the petition to wind up the company or further order. The order appointing Mr Weiss contains the following paragraph:
- c ‘AND IT IS ORDERED that the Applicant the said Official Receiver and Liquidator be at liberty to employ and out of the assets of the said Company to pay such of the clerks servants and employees of the said Company as he may consider necessary to assist the said Special Manager’.
- d On 30th November the appointment of the official receiver as provisional liquidator was continued over the adjourned hearing of the summons or further order.
- I am now asked to discharge those appointments. Counsel for the company submits that a provisional liquidator ought not to be appointed unless there are special circumstances and the fact that the company is an insurance company is not of itself, said counsel, a special circumstance. He submitted that special circumstances were such things as danger to the assets or proof of insolvency, or the fact that the petition was undefended, and he submitted that those circumstances do not prevail here. He referred me to a passage in Palmer’s Company Precedents, where it is stated¹:
- f ‘The application to appoint a provisional liquidator is by r. 8 made to the registrar by summons. The application should be supported by an affidavit as to the circumstances which render the appointment desirable, and, where any person other than the official receiver is to be appointed, as to the special fitness of the proposed provisional liquidator. If the company makes, consents to, or is shown not to oppose, the application, the appointment is almost a matter of course when it is asked that the official receiver may be appointed. The early cases seem to show that the appointment would only be made where the petition was unopposed. But where the company opposes, or does not appear, the order may now be made, if there are special circumstances such as danger to the assets or obvious insolvency, or the company has admitted that it has no defence to the petition.’
- g
- h I am not prepared to accept that those examples of cases in which the provisional liquidator would be appointed are the only cases in which an appointment may be made. There is no such limitation in s 238 of the Companies Act 1948, which confers a quite general power on the court to appoint a provisional liquidator and depending on the circumstances of each particular case, there may be other matters which may be relevant, such as the public interest which is a matter to which I will refer again in a moment or two.
- i I have been supplied with a good deal of evidence in this case and a lot of figures, but I do not propose to investigate the facts and figures in any great detail. In particular I do not propose to decide whether the necessary margin of solvency exists at the present time or not. It seems to me that that is a matter which will have to be decided on the hearing of the petition and almost certainly only after there has been cross-examination on the affidavits which have been put in.

There are two matters though, which seem to be relevant for me to consider. The first is whether the department has made out a good prima facie case for a winding-up at the hearing of the petition. Any views I express about the matter now are of course provisional only because I am not trying the petition at the present time. If the department has not made out a good prima facie case for a winding-up order then clearly I think it would not be right to appoint a provisional liquidator. On the other hand, if the department has made out a good prima facie case for a winding-up order then the second matter for my consideration arises, namely, whether in the circumstances of this case it is right that a provisional liquidator should have been appointed. So far as the first matter is concerned, in my judgment the department has made out a good prima facie case, both under s 35 of the 1967 Act and under s 13 of the 1958 Act. So far as s 35 is concerned, all the matters set out in para 9 of the petition, which I have already read, are, in my judgment, supported by the evidence at least to the extent of a good prima facie case, and I only want to add a word about the fourth of those matters, namely, that there are circumstances suggesting that the company has been seriously underestimating outstanding claims. Let me give an example of that. The company's audited accounts for the year ending 31st March 1970 contain a provision for outstanding claims of £94,823. In March 1971, a year later, the department calculated that these claims amounted in fact to £183,000 odd. In October 1971 Mr Knight, whom I have already mentioned, was able to construct a run-off statement, as it is called, for all claims which had been reported up to 31st March 1970, and as a result of that it was ascertained that the correct figure was not £94,823, but £251,698; in other words, very nearly three times the amount of the estimate.

So far as s 13 of the 1958 Act is concerned I need only mention the fact that the company's own audited accounts for the year ending 31st March 1971 showed that the margin of solvency was not met. That fact of itself is evidence that the company continues to be unable to pay its debts unless the contrary is proved. That is provided by s 17 (1) of the 1958 Act. Having regard to the conflict of evidence in regard to what the present position is, a conflict which, as I have indicated, can only be resolved on the hearing of the petition, it is impossible, I think, to say that the contrary has been proved at the present time. In these circumstances I am of opinion that the department has made out a good prima facie case for a winding-up order.

The next question, as I said, is whether a provisional liquidator ought to have been appointed. In the first place it is important to remember that the effect of a s 68 direction, to which I have already referred, is that the company's business has been very seriously curtailed—as I say it cannot write new policies or renew old ones—and now as a result of the presentation of the winding-up petition it cannot pay claims. Then there is the public interest to be considered. Counsel for the department submitted, and I agree with him, that the public interest requires either that the solvency of the company should be maintained or that the company should be wound up before its liabilities exceed its assets. The company's solvency depends to an important extent on recovering in full from its brokers and agents the balances which they are holding for the company. Those balances amount to something in the region of £300,000 and the company's accounts assume that that money is going to be recoverable in full.

At this point I want to refer to the evidence, and first of all, to the affidavit of Mr Ian Glendinning Watt, who is a chartered accountant in the City of London. He states:

'1. I am the liquidator of The Carriage Insurance Co. Limited which was wound up by an order of this Honourable Court dated 6 July 1970. Shortly after the order to wind-up the Company was made I was appointed Special Manager of the Company. 2. Following my appointment as Special Manager I experienced great a difficulty in collecting the balances due to the Company from brokers and in my opinion the difficulties were increased by the lapse of time between the presentation of the Petition and my appointment as Special Manager after the order to wind-up the Company had been made. If a Provisional Liquidator had been appointed immediately the Petition had been presented and had I been appointed Special Manager shortly thereafter I am of the opinion that the difficulties would have been considerably less. 3. In view of the difficulties which I have experienced, referred to above, I have formed the view that in all cases where a Petition b is presented for the winding-up of a Company carrying on business as motor insurers, where there are substantial balances in the hands of brokers, it is desirable that a provisional Liquidator and Special Manager be appointed as soon as possible after the presentation of a winding-up Petition.'

d 'I have acted as Liquidator in some 15 liquidations of insurance companies in this country, and have experience in cases where there have and also where there have not been Provisional Liquidators and Special Managers appointed before the winding up order was made. I draw attention to the very large sums which are owing to the company on agents' balances. These are sums payable to the company on demand [and I pause there to say I think that is not strictly accurate and I think some of that money may be payable as long ahead as four or five weeks] mostly held by brokers and consisting of premiums held by them for policies already incepted or renewed. From my experience I e consider it very important that continuous pressure be maintained on the agents to remit these sums to the company. If such a pressure is not maintained for any period experience shows that the sums become progressively more difficult to collect. This is because on the presentation of the petition policyholders seek the return of their premiums from agents who prefer to pay their own clients rather than the company. Moreover I have found the presentation of f the petition in itself affords the agents an excuse for not paying monies over to the company; and for this reason it is, in my view, essential to appoint a Provisional Liquidator who is clothed with the necessary authority to collect these and other assets of the company.'

g There speak two very experienced provisional liquidators and in the circumstances in my judgment this is a case where there ought to be a provisional liquidator and the registrar in my view was perfectly right in appointing one. I need not deal separately with the appointment of a special manager because counsel for the company accepts that if the provisional liquidator stays then it is right that Mr Weiss should stay too.

h I then come to the alternative relief sought by the notice of motion which is as follows:

j 'An injunction restraining the Official Receiver from acting whether by himself his servants agents or howsoever otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the said Order [that is the order appointing a provisional liquidator] ... An injunction restraining Gerhard Adolph Weiss from carrying on the business of the company otherwise than with a view to the preservation of its assets including goodwill until the hearing of the Petition.'

What is really being challenged here is the action taken by the special manager, with the concurrence of the provisional liquidator, in closing down the company's Bradford branch office and dismissing the staff there. What is said on behalf of the company is that that was not preserving the assets of the company but getting rid of them, and it was being done on the assumption that the company would necessarily be wound up on the hearing of the petition. It is said that this was not authorised by the order appointing a provisional liquidator which, as I have already said, contains the paragraph saying that the powers of the provisional liquidator were confined to taking possession of, collecting and protecting the assets of the company and that said assets should not be distributed until further order. In my judgment there really is not anything in this point. In the first place the order appointing the special manager itself contemplates that the provisional liquidator may not consider it necessary to employ the company's staff. I draw attention to the part of the order which I have already read saying that he is to be at liberty to employ such of the clerks, servants and employees of the company as he may feel necessary to assist the special manager, and it follows I think that those whom he did not consider would assist the special manager would have to be dismissed.

Secondly, protection of the company's assets, which the provisional liquidator is bound to afford, does not necessarily involve keeping all its offices open. As counsel for the provisional liquidator submitted, a reduction of the company's liabilities is the correlative of the protection of its assets, and this is what Mr Weiss says about the matter in the second of the affidavits which he swore. He states:

'As a result of the Company's inability to take on any new business, or even negotiate the renewal of current annual contracts, the business carried on at the Bradford premises was limited primarily to negotiating claims and maintaining contact with local brokers. I formed the view that in order to preserve the assets of the Company so far as possible it was necessary to close down the Bradford office. After consultation between myself and the Official Receiver, it was decided that this should be done, and I so instructed Mr. Stocken. He duly dismissed the staff at Bradford, closed the premises, and the keys were handed over to the Official Receiver.'

Mr Christmas, an assistant official receiver, who has had the conduct of this matter on behalf of Mr Cheek, the senior official receiver, has sworn an affidavit in which he states in para 12:

'... The Bradford Office of the Company employed 17 persons costing the Company in salaries alone some £13,834 per year or over £266 per week. Rent will become payable on the next quarter day, 25th December. The steps taken to close down the Bradford Office were taken with my approval and that of the Senior Official Receiver and upon the advice of the Special Manager. Arrangements were made for post coming to the Bradford Office to be sent to the Special Manager in London. So far from the closure of an unprofitable office being in excess of the Provisional Liquidator's powers, in my experience it is naturally one of the commonest first steps to be considered by a Provisional Liquidator. I have had no reason since to think that the closure of the Bradford Office was other than a sensible step to take for the purpose of preserving the Company's assets against continuing expenses. Even if it had been responsible for a quarter of the Company's turnover at one time its usefulness was gone once new insurance business or renewal of existing policies of insurance was forbidden under Section 68.'

In my judgment the closing down of the Bradford office was a proper and sensible step to take and one which was in the powers of the provisional liquidator. In those circumstances I do not propose granting any injunction and, as I indicated yesterday afternoon, I dismiss the motion.

[Following a discussion on costs the hearing was adjourned.]

15th December. PLOWMAN J. On 9th December I dismissed a motion by the company asking for the discharge of its provisional liquidator and special manager

a and for alternative relief by way of injunction. I then heard argument on the question of costs and said that I proposed to dismiss the motion with costs, but without prejudice to the question of the incidence of those costs, a matter which I wished to take time to consider in the light of the submissions on behalf of the respondents that the company's solicitors ought to be ordered to pay the costs personally. I indicated that I could not make any order of that sort without giving the company's solicitors an opportunity of being heard on the question. I am now satisfied that I ought not to make a personal order against the company's solicitors and I have accordingly let them know that it is unnecessary for them to be represented before me today.

b The respondents' submission was that the appointment of a provisional liquidator automatically put an end to the authority of the company's directors to instruct solicitors and counsel to represent it and that the solicitors purporting to act on its behalf were therefore liable to pay the respondents' costs personally. It is of course well settled that on a winding-up the board of directors of a company becomes functus officio and its powers are assumed by the liquidator, and my attention was drawn to *Re Mawcon Ltd*², where Pennycuik J stated in effect that the appointment of a provisional liquidator had the same result. No doubt that is so, but it is common ground that notwithstanding the appointment of the provisional liquidator the board has some residuary powers, for example it can unquestionably instruct solicitors and counsel to oppose the current petition and, if a winding-up order is made, to appeal against that order.

d The issue is to the extent of those residuary powers, and in particular whether they extend to the launching of the present motion. I think that it may sometimes be helpful to test the matter by considering the other side of the coin, namely to enquire whether the power which the board is said to have lost is one which can be said to have been assumed by the liquidator. If the answer is that it cannot, that may be a good reason for saying that the board still retains it. Clearly, for example, as I have already indicated, the power to instruct solicitors and counsel on the hearing of the winding-up petition is not a power which anyone could suggest has passed to the provisional liquidator and therefore the board retains it. If that is true in regard to the petition itself, it is, in my judgment, equally true of interlocutory proceedings which are such that it would not be appropriate for the provisional liquidator to give instructions on behalf of the company. A motion to discharge the provisional liquidator on the ground that he ought never to have been appointed clearly falls within that category, and in those circumstances I therefore dismiss the motion with costs and make no other order in regard to costs.

R v Prager

EDMUND DAVIES, STEPHENSON LJJ AND THOMPSON J

4th, 10th NOVEMBER 1971

Criminal law – Evidence – Admissibility – Admission – Confession – Confessions, answers and statements to police – Judges' Rules – Non-observance of rules – Failure to administer caution – Confession admissible despite breach of rules provided it is voluntary – Open to judge to admit confession on basis that it was voluntary without ruling whether obtained in breach of rules.

Criminal law – Evidence – Admissibility – Admission – Confessions, answers and statements to police – Voluntariness – Statements obtained by oppression – Meaning of oppression.

The Judges' Rules 1964^a are not rules of law and their non-observance will not necessarily lead to a confession being excluded from evidence, unless it is shown that the confession was not made voluntarily. Accordingly where it is alleged that a confession has been obtained in the course of questioning which was not introduced by a caution in accordance with r 2^b of the 1964 rules it is open to the trial judge to admit the confession on the basis that it was made voluntarily without ruling on the question whether it was obtained in breach of the rules (see p 1118 e and j to p 1119 a and p 1120 b, post).

In order to establish that a confession is not voluntary in that it was obtained by 'oppression'^c, it must be shown that it was obtained in circumstances which tended to sap, and did sap, the free will of the suspect. 'Oppressive questioning' may be described as questioning which by its nature, duration or other attendant circumstances (including the fact of custody) excites hopes (such as the hope of release) or fears, or so affects the mind of the suspect that his will crumbles and he speaks when otherwise he would have remained silent (see p 1119 c to f, post).

Application

This was an application by Nicholas Anthony Prager for leave to appeal against conviction, and against the sentences imposed on him on 23rd June 1971 at Leeds Assizes before Lord Widgery CJ and a jury on one count of making between 1st June and 29th July 1961 a sketch contrary to s 1 (1) (b) of the Official Secrets Act 1911 and

^b Rule 2, so far as material, provides: 'As soon as a police officer has evidence which would afford reasonable grounds for suspecting that a person has committed an offence, he shall caution that person or cause him to be cautioned before putting to him any questions, or any further questions, relating to that offence . . .'

^c The introduction to the Judges' Rules states: 'These Rules do not affect the principles . . . (e) that it is a fundamental condition of the admissibility in evidence against any person, equally of any oral answer given by that person to a question put by a police officer and of any statement made by that person, that it shall have been voluntary, in the sense that it has not been obtained from him by fear of prejudice or hope of advantage, exercised or held out by a person in authority, or by oppression.'

a on another count of communicating documents between 29th July and 2nd September 1961 contrary to s 1 (1) (c) of that Act. He was sentenced to concurrent terms of 12 years' imprisonment in respect of each of the two convictions. The facts are set out in the judgment of the court.

10th November. EDMUND DAVIES LJ delivered the following judgment of the court. On 23rd June 1971 Nicholas Anthony Prager, the applicant, was convicted at Leeds Assizes of making between 1st June and 29th July 1961 a sketch, contrary to s 1 (1) (b) of the Official Secrets Act 1911 (that was count 1), and of communicating documents between 29th July and 2nd September 1961, contrary to s 1 (1) (c) of that Act. The convictions were by an 11:1 majority. The applicant was acquitted of the third count, which charged him with doing, on 16th January 1971, an act preparatory to the commission of an offence contrary to s 7 of the Official Secrets Act 1920. He was sentenced to concurrent terms of 12 years in respect of each of the two convictions. He applied to this court for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence. d On 4th November we heard the application, the submission of counsel for the applicant being made almost entirely in camera (at the request of counsel for the Crown and with the complete concurrence of counsel for the applicant). We did not deem it necessary to hear counsel for the Crown before announcing our refusal of the application in respect of both conviction and sentence, but indicated that we would at a convenient later date give our reasons for arriving at that conclusion. That we e now proceed to do.

The applicant was born in 1928 of Czech parents and lived in Czechoslovakia until he came to this country with them in 1948 or 1949 and became a naturalised British subject. In 1949 he married a Czech woman and in May of that year joined the Royal Air Force. By 1959 he had been promoted to sergeant and, being a clever engineer, was one of a very small team engaged on highly secret and important work. f In 1958 the applicant's wife acquired an interest in a house in Prague on the death of her aunt. The applicant and his wife wanted to sell it and get the money transferred to England. But, as there were exchange control difficulties, in 1959 the applicant proposed visiting Czechoslovakia. For this purpose he needed a visa and went to the Czech Embassy in London. There he met a Mr Malek, an officer of the Czech intelligence who occupied the post of consul, and what seems to have been initially a g wholly innocent contact was to prove a turning-point in the applicant's life. In 1960 the highly secret unit in which he was serving moved to Fittingley, near Doncaster. For some reasons, which merit and have doubtless already received attention, the security system obtaining there was imperfect, for it was possible to abstract classified matter at night, photograph it, and return it undetected the following day. Among the projects being carried out was one called 'Blue Diver', and count 1 relates to h the alleged photographing of material relating thereto for the purpose of supplying it to the Czechs.

In 1961 four important events occurred. Taken individually, they may well have been capable of an innocent explanation but, when regarded collectively, were said by the Crown to provide a powerful indication that the applicant was preparing for espionage. Firstly, in February 1961, the applicant and his wife—or at least the wife— j were on terms of social intimacy with Mr Malek. Secondly, in March 1961, the applicant sought a three months extension of his 12 year Royal Air Force engagement which was due to expire the following May. He explained that he sought the extension so as to complete a course of study he was then undoubtedly pursuing, whereas the Crown alleged that the extra months covered June and July, thus enabling him to have access to secret material for the time necessary to enable him to further the course of espionage on which he was set. Thirdly, during 1961 the applicant bought a polaroid camera and a 'close-up' kit at a total cost in excess of £120. It could undoubtedly be used for photographing documents and would enable its user to know instantly whether he had procured a satisfactory result. Fourthly, the applicant and his wife required a visa for the Czechoslovakian holiday they took in 1961, and for this purpose were in contact with Mr Malek. The Crown alleged that it was during a visit by the applicant to the Czech Embassy that he handed over to Mr Malek his photographs of secret material. In August 1961 the applicant left the Royal Air Force and became engaged on computer work with English Electric. This involved his visiting Czechoslovakia from time to time during the next ten years.

When it was that the intelligence staff of this country first interested themselves in the applicant is not clear. All we know is that it was only after 'prolonged enquiries' that Detective Chief Superintendent Craig and Detective Superintendent Sills and other police officers arrived at his home near Rotherham at 8.00 am on Sunday, 31st January 1971. At the outset he was shown a search warrant issued under the Official Secrets Act 1911. He was then told that the police wanted to question him regarding a serious matter and was asked whether he preferred to go to the police station for the purpose. He said he did, and in the 25 minute journey to Doncaster police headquarters remarked, 'This whole thing is a fantasy, but I will help you all I can'. They arrived there at 9.15 am and his wife followed soon after. It has not been suggested to this court that the applicant then or at any time before he was charged thought, or had any grounds for thinking, that he was not free to leave the police station had he wanted to.

On arrival, the applicant was given refreshment and Detective Chief Superintendent Craig forthwith began questioning him and, conforming to a decision previously arrived at, they gave him no caution before doing so. In essence, this application turns on whether they were right in so refraining. The submission of counsel for the applicant is that it was a completely wrong decision and should have led to the exclusion from the jury's consideration of everything said or acknowledged by the applicant thereafter.

In his submissions before us, counsel for the applicant conveniently divided the events of the day into session I, lasting from 9.15 am to 12.30 pm, session II from 5.45 pm to about 7.40 pm, and session III from 7.40 pm to about 11.30 pm. During session I the applicant made no admissions, and in particular denied taking illicit photographs or meeting Czechs whom he knew to be intelligence agents working for their country. Questioning broke off at 12.30 pm, when (accompanied by a detective officer) the applicant took a walk in the precincts of the police headquarters, had lunch and then rested and slept in a room made available to him. When he awoke, he was given tea and freshened himself up. At 5.45 pm his interrogation was resumed, thus beginning what his counsel described as session II. At about 7.40 pm something significant occurred, for on being asked whether he had been regarded as an agent by the Czech intelligence, he replied, 'It did not happen like that. Anything I have done was done unwittingly, but you must know my family are out of this'. At this point Detective Chief Superintendent Craig cautioned the applicant in accordance with r 2 of the Judges' Rules 1964¹, and it is to be observed that when Lord Widgery CJ came to sum up, he told the jury:

'It is not perhaps without importance to remember that that caution was, according to the prosecution—the police officers—and really not challenged by the defence given to [the applicant] before he made any kind of admission in this matter at all.'

Session III began with the caution at 7.40 pm. Between then and 9.00 pm the applicant orally admitted buying a polaroid camera and a 'close-up' kit in Sheffield, and photographing 'stuff' in his kitchen. Asked what 'stuff' he was referring to, he replied,

- a 'Just pictures of general calculations'. Asked to which device these calculations related, he said 'Blue Diver'. He went on to say that he had handed these over to Mr Malek at the Czech Embassy in London, and spoke of later passing notes on 'Blue Diver' to two Czech intelligence officers at Jevaney when on holiday in Czechoslovakia and of being paid by them £200 or £300, which he regarded as 'an advance against the sale of my house'. At 9.35 pm he was asked whether he was prepared to furnish a signed statement and he assented, but asked whether he might take another walk before doing so. He then took a short walk, again accompanied by a detective officer. At 9.50 pm he was cautioned in the terms laid down by r 3 of the Judges' Rules 1964 and between then and 11.30 pm he dictated a long statement. On its completion, he read and initialled each page and signed the completed statement. It is not contested that the statement, if true, constituted a complete admission of the two offences on which he was later convicted by the jury. In relation to one of counsel
- c for the applicant's submissions, it is convenient to observe at this point that Lord Widgery CJ in due course told the jury that, if they were satisfied that such portion of the statement as dealt with the alleged espionage arrangements in 1971 which formed the basis of the third count in the indictment was true and voluntary, 'then of course you will have no alternative but to convict him', despite which, as we have
- d already said, the jury acquitted on that count.

On 1st March the same two officers saw the applicant and his solicitor at the prison. Reading from a script, the applicant then made a second statement, the opening words being:

- e 'I wish to make a statement in which I will tell you the truth. The previous statement which I was required to make on the 31st January is not true in most of its contents because I was induced to make that statement and I was in a state of fear.'

- It constituted a complete denial of any participation in espionage activities. At the trial, when Detective Superintendent Sills was about to tell the court what happened after the applicant reached the police headquarters on 31st January, counsel for the applicant intimated that he desired to develop an objection in the absence of the jury.
- f They accordingly retired, and there ensued a trial within the main trial, regarding the admissibility of the proposed prosecution evidence relating to events occurring after 9.15 am. His submissions may thus be summarised. In laying information for the purpose of obtaining a search warrant pursuant to s 9 of the Official Secrets Act 1911 (which requires that a magistrate must be 'satisfied by information on oath that there is reasonable ground for suspecting that an offence under this Act has been or is about to be committed'), Detective Chief Superintendent Craig had sworn that his grounds for suspicion were that the applicant had 'made a sketch of a certain secret document which was calculated to be useful to an enemy'. Furthermore, the whole tenor of the questioning thereafter disclosed that the police already had detailed knowledge of the applicant's activities and that an informant or informants had disclosed matters of considerable gravity concerning him. As a result, before
- h any questioning began, the police had, in the words of r 2 'evidence which would afford reasonable grounds for suspecting' that the applicant had committed breaches of s 1 of the Act and should, therefore, have administered the caution prescribed by that rule. As they had failed to do so, the court ought, in the proper exercise of its discretion, to have excluded all evidence relating to what transpired after 9.15 am, for the omission was fatal to admissibility and could not be cured by the cautions
- j later given. This was a somewhat unusual trial within a trial. For example, at no stage of it was the police evidence challenged. Again, neither the applicant nor any other witness was called to testify as to circumstances which might provide a factual ground for excluding the confession. On the contrary, counsel for the applicant made it clear that his objection to admissibility had 'nothing to do with fears, inducements, or threats', although the applicant 'had certain fears in his own mind', which turned out to be a fear that his wife might have been guilty of the offences into which the police were enquiring. It may here be conveniently noted that this disclaimer was in line with those made at a later stage in the trial when, his submission on admissibility having been overruled, counsel for the applicant cross-examined the police in the jury's presence. For example, he assured Detective Superintendent Sills that no impropriety was suggested, nor was it suggested that the applicant 'was induced by you in any improper sense', nor that, despite his second statement, the applicant had been 'made' to say anything.

Having regard to this attitude, one might be forgiven for concluding that counsel for the applicant was taking his stand simply and solely on the alleged breach of r 2. But it turned out that this was not so, for it later emerged that, despite his assurances, he was further (or alternatively) basing his objection on a wider and more fundamental ground. Turning to note (e) to the Judges' Rules 1964, with its insistence that, before being admitted in evidence, an alleged confession must be proved to have been 'voluntary, in the sense that it has not been obtained . . . by fear of prejudice or hope of advantage . . . or by oppression', counsel for the applicant submitted that the form, prolongation, and quick-firing of the questioning of the accused was designed to 'crack' him and accordingly amounted to 'oppression'. In the result, it somewhat tortuously emerged during the sub-trial that two questions were being raised: (a) was r 2 breached? and (b) had the prosecution proved that the applicant's oral admissions and signed statement were made voluntarily?

Question (a) was, in effect, treated by counsel for the applicant as conclusive of this appeal. But as the 1964 rules make clear, they were—

'put forward as a guide to police officers conducting investigations. Non-conformity with these rules may render answers and statements liable to be excluded from evidence in subsequent criminal proceedings.'

Nevertheless, counsel for the applicant insisted that the admissibility of an alleged confession must in the first place (and, he seemed to be saying, in the last place also) depend on whether the rules have been complied with. He submitted that it was incumbent on Lord Widgery CJ to decide whether, when the interrogation of the applicant began, the police already had 'evidence' which would afford reasonable grounds for suspecting that he had committed offences against the Official Secrets Act 1911.

Lord Widgery CJ declined to rule whether or not such 'evidence' had existed. Some of the material presented when, in the course of the sub-trial the court proceeded to sit in camera, rendered this, as he understandably said, 'a very difficult question'. But Lord Widgery CJ added that, in the light of his conclusion regarding the overriding issue of voluntariness, he found it unnecessary to decide it. Counsel for the applicant has strongly criticised this approach. He submitted before us that Lord Widgery CJ should have decided first whether r 2 had or had not been breached for, if it had been, the confession should not have been admitted unless there emerged 'some compelling reason why the breach should have been overlooked'. He cited no authority for that proposition which, he claimed, involved a point of law of very great importance. This 'complete lack of authority' (to use counsel's phrase) is not surprising, for in our judgment, the proposition advanced involves no point of law and is manifestly unsound. Its acceptance would exalt the Judges' Rules into rules of law. That they do not purport to be, and there is abundant authority for saying that they are nothing of the kind. Their non-observance may, and at times does, lead to the exclusion of an alleged confession; but ultimately all turns on the judge's decision whether, breach or no breach, it has been shown to have been made voluntarily. In the present case, Lord Widgery CJ was, without deciding the point, prepared to assume in the applicant's favour that there had been a breach of r 2, and then proceeded to consider whether its voluntary nature had nevertheless been established. In our judgment, no valid criticism of that approach can be made. On the contrary, a it appears to us entirely sound and, it should be pointed out, strictly in line with the observation of counsel for the applicant: 'I cannot complain if your Lordship says, "I prefer to answer the overall question" . . .'

We, therefore, turn to question (b), namely, was the voluntary nature of the alleged oral and written confessions established? In *Comrs of Customs and Excise v Harz*² Lord Reid, in a speech with which all the other Law Lords agreed, treated the test laid down in principle (e) in the introduction to the Judges' Rules as a correct statement of the law. As we have already indicated, the criticism directed in the present case against the police is that their interrogation constituted 'oppression'. This word appeared for the first time in the Judges' Rules 1964, and it closely followed the observation of Lord Parker CJ in *Callis v Gunn*³ condemning confessions 'obtained in an oppressive manner'.

c The only reported judicial consideration of 'oppression' in the Judges' Rules of which we are aware is that of Sachs J in *R v Priestley*⁴ where he said:

' . . . to my mind, this word in the context of the principles under consideration imports something which tends to sap, and has sapped, that free will which must exist before a confession is voluntary . . . Whether or not there is oppression in an individual case depends upon many elements. I am not going into all of them. They include such things as the length of time of any individual period of questioning, the length of time intervening between periods of questioning, whether the accused person has been given proper refreshment or not, and the characteristics of the person who makes the statement. What may be oppressive as regards a child, an invalid or an old man or somebody inexperienced in the ways of this world may turn out not to be oppressive when one finds that the accused person is of a tough character and an experienced man of the world.'

In an address to the Bentham Club in 1968⁵, Lord MacDermott described 'oppressive questioning' as—

f 'questioning which by its nature, duration or other attendant circumstances (including the fact of custody) excites hopes (such as the hope of release) or fears, or so affects the mind of the suspect that his will crumbles and he speaks when otherwise he would have stayed silent.'

We adopt these definitions or descriptions and apply them to the present case. In doing so, we must bear in mind that in the lower court counsel for the applicant, while in one breath complaining of the nature of the police interrogation, in the next breath told Lord Widgery CJ:

'This is not a case, and I stress it, of continual third degree grilling or questioning from 9.15 right through the whole time.'

We must also have regard to the fact that, while counsel expressly disclaimed the assertion made in the course of the applicant's second statement of 1st March that the police had 'made' and 'induced' him to say things which were untrue, before us he asserted that, although 'two very skilful police officers did their duty in the highest tradition of their force', they erred in that, 'by persistent pressure and cross-examination they set out to break this suspect'. By the time the sub-trial began, one of these two officers, Detective Superintendent Sills, had embarked on his evidence and was thus seen and heard by Lord Widgery CJ (although not under cross-examination), but at no stage before a ruling on admissibility was called for was any evidence given by the applicant. The ruling had accordingly to be based on what had emerged regarding the events of 31st January, including sessions I and II, the giving of the first caution at 7.40 pm, the giving of the second caution at 9.50 pm, and the manner in which the written statement was taken, read, initialled and signed by the applicant. In the light of that material, Lord Widgery CJ posed to himself the question of whether the propriety of admitting evidence of the oral and written admissions had been established by the Crown. He expressed himself as satisfied that this was so even on the assumption that r 2 had been breached.

In the judgment of this court, nothing has emerged during the hearing of this application to indicate any reason for holding that Lord Widgery CJ erred in exercising his undoubted discretion as he did in admitting the accused's oral and written statements. After the jury had returned to the court, the detective officers were strongly cross-examined on this issue of voluntariness. The applicant, the sole defence witness, said that his admissions were untrue, that he had wanted to leave the police station, that he had asked in vain to see a lawyer and his wife (who he knew was also at the police headquarters) that by 7.30 pm he was feeling terrible and his mind was a blank, and that from that time onwards he tried to tell the police what they were obviously expecting him to say, being able to 'make up' his confession from the form of the questions they had put to him. As against that, the jury had the evidence of Detective Superintendent Sils that, when his colleague said he was seeking the applicant's co-operation regarding the truth or falsity of certain matters, the applicant replied:

'I came with you because I wanted to find out what it was all about and I want to help you if I can because I admire the British way you know, but it really sounds a lot of rubbish to me, but go ahead, ask me what you like.'

In the course of the summing-up, repeated warnings were given to the jury of the necessity of their being sure that the confessions were both true and voluntary. Nevertheless, the criticism was advanced before us that the long, detailed questioning of the applicant called for a stronger warning than those given. We find this criticism baseless. Other criticisms were advanced and we do not propose to deal with them here, save to say that we have considered them carefully and they have induced no doubt in our minds regarding the soundness of the convictions returned. We make special mention only of the submission that there was such an inconsistency between the convictions on counts 1 and 2 and (despite the previously quoted observation of Lord Widgery CJ) the acquittal on count 3 that the former should be regarded as unsafe. We do not agree. The charges were entirely different in character, further evidence which related only to the first two charges was presented, the third charge related to alleged incidents occurring ten years later than those giving rise to the first two counts, and it may well be that, having come to a firm conclusion in regard to the 1961 counts, they regarded as vague and unsatisfactory the further charge of doing 'an act preparatory to communicating to another person', etc. But speculation on the point is a sleeveless errand. The real test is whether, despite the undoubted inconsistency, there are any grounds for suspecting that the convictions on the first and second counts were unsafe and unsatisfactory. In our judgment, no such grounds have been shown to exist.

For the foregoing reasons, we came to the conclusion that the application for leave to appeal against conviction must be refused.

As to the 12 year concurrent sentences imposed, the applicant is a man of 42, and his counsel stressed that his convictions related to events of ten years ago and that it had not been suggested that actual harm to this country had resulted therefrom. On the other hand, with typical candour he conceded that the applicant had revealed a very important anti-radar device to the agents of a potential enemy. Nevertheless, he submitted that concurrent sentences of seven to eight years would meet the justice of the case. In our judgment, it was one of great gravity and the sentences

- a imposed might well have been higher had the offences not been, as Lord Widgery CJ put it—
- ‘substantially mitigated by the fact that . . . ten years have passed since [the offences were] committed and no disaster, fortunately, has befallen this country as a consequence of what you did.’
- b We see no reason to take a different view and accordingly the application in relation to sentence is likewise refused.
- Application refused. Application refused for a certificate that a point of law of general public importance was involved.*

- The husband and wife were married in 1949 and had three children. The husband was granted a divorce in 1968. Prior to the hearing of the petition an arrangement was made between the parties which was approved and, in substantially the same words, incorporated into the order of the court. Under the terms of the order the husband undertook, inter alia, ‘to make available for the [wife’s] use the house he is now erecting at . . . Cheam, Surrey, rent free for her life or until such time as circumstances should arise in which by reason of her conduct she is debarred by the Court from access to the children of the family . . .’ Following the divorce, the wife formed an association with A with whom she had subsequently in effect been living for a period of well over two years. During this time she rarely used the house at Cheam, sleeping in it only on rare occasions and visiting it sometimes during the week to deal with personal property which she kept there. She also let the house during this period to another woman. The husband applied to have the order varied and to be released from his undertaking on the ground that the wife no longer had any use for the house. On behalf of the wife it was contended, (1) that by the terms of the order she had been given a complete unfettered use of the house subject only to the two limitations imposed on her by the court, i.e. death or a subsequent order of the court as to access; (2) that subject to those two limitations she was entitled to treat the house as her own, either occupying it herself, or living elsewhere and, if she wished, letting the house to one or more tenants; and (3) that consequently she was using the house consistently with the terms of the order.
- g

- j

Held – It was plain from the circumstances of the agreement and the terms of the order that the husband’s undertaking was to allow the wife to use the house for her personal residence and not otherwise; it was not within the contemplation of the parties, nor within the terms of the order, that the wife should reside elsewhere and let the house to a third party for profit; accordingly the court was not debarred by the terms of the order from considering whether or not the order should be varied; in the light of the new, un contemplated circumstances which had arisen the order should be varied by releasing the husband from his undertaking to make the house available for the wife's use (see p 1126 e, p 1127 c e and f, p 1128 c e and f and p 1129 b to h, post.)

Appeal

This was an appeal by the husband against that part of the order made by Faulks J in chambers dated 18th November 1971 whereby he dismissed the husband's application to be released from his undertaking contained in the order of Orr J made on 20th June 1968 on the grant of a decree nisi in proceedings for divorce brought by the husband. By his notice of appeal the husband sought to be released from the undertaking and to vary in such manner as to the court might seem just that part of the order made by Faulks J as ordered that the maintenance payable by the husband to the wife in accordance with the order of Orr J be reduced from £1,500 per annum less tax to £780 per annum less tax. The facts are set out in the judgment of Davies LJ.

K Bruce Campbell QC and P T H Morgan for the husband.

Joseph Jackson QC and J C J Tatham for the wife.

DAVIES LJ. This is an appeal by a husband petitioner from an order of Faulks J made on 18th November 1971. There was before him a two-fold application by the husband. The first application was to release him from an undertaking which he had given on the divorce and was embodied in an order of the divorce court, as it then was, made on 20th June 1968—I am not quoting the exact words now; they will have to be quoted in a moment—to make available a house for the wife. The second application by the husband was to reduce the amount of maintenance which he had agreed to pay to her and was also contained in the order of the court of June 1968, in the amount of £1,500. In the event the learned judge refused the first application by the husband, on the ground that he had no power to make the order asked for; but he allowed the husband's application to vary the amount of periodical payments (as they would be called now) from £1,500 less tax to £780 less tax. The husband, as I say, appeals against that order.

I need not say anything about the reduction of £1,500 to £780. Counsel for the wife has not sought to upset that order; and counsel for the husband says that the husband is a very rich man and that, although in theory he would be prepared to contend that the maintenance or periodical payments should be further reduced, the husband is content that the wife should continue to have this sum of £780. The real fight below and on this appeal has been with regard to the house.

The material dates are really within a very small compass. The parties were married in March 1949. They have had three children, a daughter, now about 22, a a son, now about 20, and another daughter of about 15 years of age. In 1968, after the parties had separated, the husband obtained a decree of dissolution on the ground of adultery. There were two co-respondents, as they were then called. The wife at first defended the proceedings; she denied adultery, and cross-prayed on the ground of cruelty and adultery, the husband having asked in his petition for the exercise of the court's discretion. In the event, the defence was abandoned and the wife was content to let the husband obtain a decree on the ground of adultery with one of the two co-respondents.

b Prior to the hearing, which was on 20th June 1968, a date which I have already mentioned, there had been negotiations between the parties acting through two very experienced firms of solicitors. They resulted in an arrangement between the parties which was put before the court and approved of and was then incorporated, not quite in the same order but in substantially the same words, into the order of the court. Speaking for myself, I do not think it makes any difference whether what the court is concerned with is the contractual arrangement between the parties or the actual order of the court, although for my part, I think that the document to be considered is the actual order of the court, which I think took the place of and incorporated the previous arrangement between the parties.

c One thing should be said at the outset of this judgment. Counsel for the wife, with his great knowledge of these matters, admits categorically that the court (Faulks J in this case) had power not only to vary the maintenance order but to vary, amend or discharge any other part of the order under the Matrimonial Proceedings and Property Act 1970, including the power to release the husband, if the learned judge on the facts so thought fit, from his undertaking. It is therefore unnecessary to consider the provisions of s 9 of the Act or of ss 13 and 14, the jurisdiction being admitted.

d I turn now to the order. It is convenient perhaps that I should read all the effective parts, although it is really para (1) of the order with which we are here concerned. After dealing with custody and care and control and access, it proceeds in these terms:

f '... upon the Petitioner undertaking:— (1) to make available for the Respondent's use the house that he is now erecting at Salisbury Avenue, Cheam, Surrey, rent free for her life or until such time as circumstances should arise in which by reason of her conduct she is debarred by the Court from access to the children of the family. Until such house is available for the Respondent's use, she shall be entitled to remain at her present address Rothbury, Tite Hill, Englefield Green, Surrey; (2) to pay the outgoings, namely rates, external decorative and structural repairs, and the insurance of the property and its contents; (3) to pay the Respondent's reasonable costs of removal from Rothbury, Tite Hill, Englefield Green, Surrey to Salisbury Avenue, Cheam, Surrey; (4) to see that the house at Salisbury Avenue, Cheam, Surrey is reasonably and adequately furnished either with existing furniture from Rothbury aforesaid and/or with new furniture. In this context, furniture will include curtains and carpeting; (5) to pay the Respondent a lump sum on the date upon which the Decree Nisi herein shall be made Absolute of £500. 0. 0. It is ORDERED that the Petitioner do pay or cause to be paid to the Respondent as from the date on which the Decree Nisi herein shall be made Absolute or until further order Maintenance at and after the rate of £1,500. 0. 0. per annum less tax payable monthly, the Petitioner having undertaken to provide that such sum shall be payable to the Respondent during her life or until her remarriage'.

Then there is an order with regard to costs.

The important part of that order with which we are concerned is the paragraph numbered (1):

'... the Petitioner undertaking ... to make available for the Respondent's use the house that he is now erecting at Salisbury Avenue, Cheam, Surrey, rent free for her life or until such time as circumstances should arise in which by reason of her conduct she is debarred by the Court from access to the children of the family'; and then there is the transitional provision with regard to the period during which the house was being built.

That order, as I have said, was made in June 1968. The decree became absolute on 20th September. At some date of which we are not precisely apprised but, it would appear, well over two years ago, the wife formed an association with a Mr Ashton. It is perfectly clear on the evidence that for that period of over two years she has in effect been living with Mr Ashton, at a house I suppose not far away because it is at Cheam Common. She has not been living at the house at Salisbury Avenue, and it would appear that on very rare occasions has she ever slept the night there. She has on one or two occasions; and it is perhaps to be noticed that on 8th and 9th November 1971, when it is to be presumed that she was aware of the husband's application, she did actually sleep the night there. According to her evidence she does go to the house during the day time some three or four days a week; but obviously her sleeping quarters are in Mr Ashton's house. She has had the children to the house to lunch or dinner or something of that kind from time to time; but by and large her residence has been at Mr Ashton's house.

As I understand it, the way in which the case is put by counsel for the husband, subject to a new matter that I shall mention in a moment, is not that her conduct in committing adultery (because she has been committing adultery) with Mr Ashton disentitles her to have either the same amount of maintenance or the facility of having this house for her use, but that she in effect has now, in the light of the life she has been leading for the past two years and a bit, no use for the house, because she is not using it. That submission is emphasised by the fact that admittedly she has let the house to another woman, who, I think, has a child there, the wife says at £5 a week although the daughter of the marriage apparently told her father that the rent was £9 a week. What is said is that, the husband having undertaken to provide the house for her use in the terms which I have read, he should now be released from that undertaking because she obviously has no use for the house at all. The learned judge in a passage to which I will refer in a moment talks about forfeiture. I am afraid that I cannot see that forfeiture has anything whatsoever to do with this case.

I interpolate here something that happened this afternoon. Counsel for the wife made an application for leave to call fresh evidence. I do not propose to read out, because we rejected the application, the statement which the wife has made with regard to this matter. Had we been prepared to admit the evidence, then of course counsel for the husband would have been entitled to cross-examine the lady. But we did not admit it, and I will only summarise very shortly the remarkable matter that emerges from the lady's written statement. We were told, as I believe is the fact, that Mr Ashton, with whom she has been living for this considerable period, was sitting in court yesterday—not, of course, to give any evidence, but I suppose as an interested supporter of the wife's case. He was not in court today. In effect, the evidence that counsel for the wife wished her to give was a complete volte face, a complete change of circumstances, to be summarised in the last paragraph of the wife's statement to the effect: 'I do not think that I shall renew my association with Mr Ashton.' We came to the conclusion that this short statement of the wife's, quite apart from being possibly somewhat suspect in all the circumstances of this change of heart that had apparently crystallised last evening when this case was part-heard, was really not relevant evidence which could have any decisive effect on the decision in this appeal, and so, as I say, it was rejected.

As I understood counsel for the wife's argument, the effect of it was that the word a 'use' in the undertaking—'to make available for the [wife's] use the house'—gave the wife the right to do as she pleased with it, to occupy it or not occupy it, or to let it as she has done; and he went so far, I think, as to suggest that by the terms of the document the wife had an equitable interest (as it used to be) in the house and, therefore, it is to be assumed, under the Settled Land Act 1925 could sell it and receive the income from the proceeds. It seems to me that the words used are wholly inapt to create such an estate or interest.

b Counsel for the wife cited to the court, as he did to Faulks J in the court below, a number of authorities as to the effect of similar dispositions, if I may so call them, in wills. I think I need not refer to more than one of them, namely *Re Anderson, Halligey v Kirkley*¹. That was a judgment of Sargant J, in which he reviewed a number of the other authorities that were cited to us and spoke as follows. He said²:

c 'I have to consider the case, first of all, apart from the Settled Land Act, and, secondly, with regard to any alterations in the law alleged to be introduced as the result of that Act. As regards the law independently of the Act, it seems to me that the terms of Kirkley's will are perfectly plain, and that he has merely given to his widow, in addition to the annuity of 6000*l.* a year, an option, liberty or licence to occupy personally by herself any one or more of his residences, but has not given her anything beyond a personal right of occupation. Does such a gift of a personal right of occupation carry with it the right to let to another person and to receive the profits of the letting or the right in case of a sale to receive the income of the proceeds of sale as an equivalent or substitution for the right of personal occupation? In my judgment, neither on principle nor on authority can such a claim be sustained. The very clear words of the will, looking at the question apart from authority, prescribe that the lady is to have the right of personal use and occupation; the words are "shall be at liberty to use and enjoy all or any of my residences for her own personal use and occupation."'

e It is right, of course, as counsel for the wife pointed out, that those words are much more conscribed than the mere word 'use' in the present case. Nevertheless I think
f that the judgment of Sargant J is of very great assistance in the present case. He continued³:

g 'It appears to me quite clear that those words, apart from the decisions, merely give her a personal right to live in the house—to reside in it—if she thinks fit. Whether, if she were living in the house generally, permanently, that would preclude her from letting it for short periods furnished is a question which has not arisen and which I do not consider at all.'

Then he refers to one of the decisions to which we were referred by counsel for the wife, *Rabbeth v Squire*⁴, and I will read the passage³:

h 'Is there anything in the authorities cited to displace that view? In my judgment there is not. The authorities rather support the conclusion at which I have arrived. In *Rabbeth v. Squire*⁴ Lord Chelmsford L.C. decided that a gift by will of the joint use and occupation of lands did not require personal use and occupation but permitted the donees to let the lands. But he pointed out that that was the effect of the gift of the use and occupation, and especially that there was nothing in the terms of the other parts of the will that would reduce that general right to a right of personal use and occupation. It seems to me to be clear that if, either in consequence of the context or by virtue of the terms of the original gift, what had passed to the claimant had been the right of personal use and occupation, the decision of Lord Chelmsford would have been the other way.' a

Then he refers to two other cases that we have had—*May v May*⁵ and *Mannox v Greener*⁶—and concludes⁷:

'The reasoning in *Rabbeth v. Squire*⁸ and the decision in *May v. May*⁵ really render it indisputable that a gift of a right personally to use and reside in a house cannot carry with it the right to live elsewhere and to let the house and receive the rents.' b

I think that that is a clear statement of the law. One looks at this particular order and the context in which it was made, bearing in mind that this was a husband who on a divorce was providing accommodation for the wife to live in; and some weight, in my judgment, should be given to the somewhat unusual provision whereby her right to live there should be defeated if her conduct was such as to debar her by court order from access to the children. That points, of course, to one of the purposes for which the wife was to have this house, namely, to have access to her children. Counsel for the wife contends on the facts that she was 'using the property'. He could not, I think, contend that she was living there, because she obviously was not. But he says that she was 'using' it, even though she had let it, because she went there a few days per week, I suppose, although there is no evidence about it, to look out some clothing or other things, personal property that she had in the house, to deal with them. We have no evidence about that. c

It seems to me that it is quite wrong to say that she was 'using' the property. The purpose of her use of the property was to be as a residence, as is perfectly plain from the circumstances in which the agreement was made. d

The learned judge's judgment is, if I may say so with respect, not altogether easy to understand. He states, correctly no doubt, that he had been taken through these various authorities by counsel for the wife; and he sums up the law in this way: e

'The upshot of all those cases is that if someone is given a house for their life, it does not follow because they rent it to another person that a forfeiture is brought about. Indeed, Lord Eldon, in the case cited⁹, very sensibly referred to the case of a man who has got a town house and a country house and asked if a Member of Parliament were to occupy his town house for the course of the session, could it really be said that there was a forfeiture because he had rented it to someone else apart from that period.' f

I would interpolate there that obviously the wife would have been entitled to let the house for a short term if she was going abroad for a holiday or going for a cruise round the world, or something of that kind. But that is quite different, as I see it, from living in another house and letting this one, for what period we do not know, but semi-permanently. Then the judge continued: g

'I am sure that the effect of those cases is as [counsel for the wife] suggests, and the terms of the agreement being as follows [and then he quotes the debarment from access], I hold that those are the two circumstances, and the two circumstances only, by which, as a matter of contract, she is to be deprived of that house. And what has happened? (1) She is alive, and (2) nobody has suggested for a moment that she should be debarred by the court from access to the children of the family.' h

In regard to that I would say, as I have already indicated, that I do not consider that j a this is a matter of contract. It is a matter of the jurisdiction of the court to alter or discharge a provision in an order which the court has made.

Then the judge concludes as follows, having discussed the evidence of the wife (whom, rather surprisingly, he described as 'a truthful witness'; I say 'surprisingly' in view of some of the statements in her affidavit).

b 'She tells me that she was in the house at Salisbury Avenue as recently as last Wednesday, Thursday and Friday for the day and that she actually spent the night there on 8th and 9th November [1971], although it is true she had not been there for seven or eight months past. [I have already referred to the nights of the 8th and 9th November and the circumstances in which she came to go there.] So she has not, in my view, completely abandoned the house, even though, in law, I think she was entitled to let it to another.'

c So he decided that the action of the wife did not amount to an abandonment of the house and of her right to use it.

I take a different view. It seems to me that the terms of this order made by Orr J did not give the wife any right or interest in the house at all. It seems to me that it was a licence, a permission, undertaken to be given by the husband to her for and as a residence for her. It is true that, in the light of the new suggestion that has been

d put forward for the first time today, the circumstances in which she has been living over the last two years or so may, or may not, have been altered. But, on the evidence that was before the learned judge, and the only evidence that has been admitted before us, the wife was not 'using' the house in the sense of the licence that she had been given to do so. On the evidence she had no need of the house. She was able to be housed, no doubt very largely at the expense of Mr Ashton, in Mr Ashton's e house.

In those circumstances, I think that the judge was not only wrong in law, if I may say so with respect, as to the effect of this undertaking, but came to the wrong conclusion on the facts on the question whether she had by her conduct rendered the licence wholly unnecessary.

f In those circumstances, whatever may happen in the future on different evidence on a different occasion, I think that the learned judge came to the wrong conclusion with regard to this house, and I would for myself allow the appeal in that regard and release the husband from his undertaking.

MEGAW LJ. The argument put forward by counsel for the wife, as I understand it, was this: take the agreement which was made between the parties, settled by g counsel, no doubt carefully and in advance of the divorce proceedings. Look, says counsel, at cl 4 of that agreement, or, because for all practical purposes it is identical, at the undertaking which was incorporated in the order of Orr J made on 20th June 1968. On the true construction of that clause of that agreement, counsel says, the h parties had agreed that the wife should be free to have complete, unfettered use of the house at Salisbury Avenue, Cheam, rent free, subject only to two limitations: first, her right to the house would terminate on her death; secondly, her right to the house would terminate if circumstances should arise in which, by reason of her conduct, she should be debarred by the court from access to the children of the family. Subject to those two limitations, one of death and one of a subsequent order of the court as to access, the wife was entitled to treat the house as though it were her own i for the period of her life. She could, if she wished, live in it. She was not obliged to do so. She could, if she wished, live elsewhere, leaving the house unoccupied. She could, if she wished, let the house to one or more tenants and herself live elsewhere. The true construction of that agreement, says counsel for the wife does not involve any kind of condition as to the wife continuing to reside in the house. Then, says counsel, if that construction be correct it must be accepted that the parties, when they made that agreement, subsequently incorporated as an undertaking in the order of the court, appreciated its consequences and intended that its consequences should follow. Those consequences, on that construction, would be that the wife was perfectly entitled under the terms of that agreement to do any of the things which I have mentioned, involving her absence from the house—even permanent absence. a

That being the intention of the parties, the argument goes on, it cannot now be said that there has been any change of circumstances from those which the parties both contemplated when the agreement was made, because all that has happened is that the wife has done that which the agreement permitted her to do within her rights under cl 4 of the agreement, namely, herself to live elsewhere over a period of years and to allow somebody else to live in the house, paying—I had better not use the word ‘rent’—remuneration to her. b

That might be a powerful argument, although it is unnecessary to consider whether there are possible weaknesses in it, if it were the true construction of the agreement. But in my judgment it is not the true construction of the agreement. On the contrary, in cl 4 of the agreement (and, as I have said, the same applies to the undertaking in the judge’s order) the words ‘for the [wife’s] use’ mean, in this context, ‘to reside in’, or ‘for her residence’. c

That that is the meaning in the context is, to my mind, plain when one looks at other provisions of the agreement. For example, under cl 7 the husband undertook to see that this house, which was then being completed, was ‘reasonably and adequately furnished’, to include curtains and carpeting. The furniture belonged, and would continue to belong, to the husband. For what purpose? For the use of the house as a residence for the wife, and not for the use of other persons to whom the wife might, for gain, choose to let the house. To suggest that this agreement contemplated that this furniture was to be provided by the husband for such a purpose is, to my mind, absurd. d

It goes further than that. In cl 5 one finds that the husband undertakes to ‘pay the outgoings, namely rates, external decorative and structural repairs, and the insurance of the property and its contents’. Could it sensibly be suggested that the husband was undertaking by that agreement to insure the property and its contents, the contents to include such things as might be brought into the house by other persons when the wife was no longer residing there? As I say, it is to my mind plain, on a construction of this agreement as a whole, that what was contemplated, and intended, and provided, by the words used was that the house was to be made available for the wife as her residence and not otherwise. e

It is unnecessary to decide in this case—as it was unnecessary for Sargant J to decide in *Re Anderson, Halligey v Kirkley*¹⁰, which Davies LJ has cited—to what extent the wife would have been free to go away for a holiday and allow somebody else to occupy the house temporarily. I have no doubt myself that within a reasonable degree that would have been perfectly permissible, within the scope of the intention of cl 4. But that does not arise in the present case. f

In my view the learned judge has been led astray by his consideration of the old cases which were cited to him. The passage in the judgment which Davies LJ has already read, where the learned judge referred to the question of a forfeiture, in my respectful view shows that the learned judge had not fully appreciated the position. There is here no question of forfeiture, in the sense in which that word is used in the cases. It is simply a question of the true construction of the agreement for the purpose of seeing to what extent it can fairly and properly be said that what has happened is something which is a new circumstance beyond that which was contemplated when the agreement was made and the order was made. g

The true approach to the old cases which were cited is in my view set out in one short sentence of the judgment of Sargant J which again Davies LJ has already read. h a That is the sentence of the report where, dealing with the old case of *Rabbeth v Squire*¹¹, Sargent J said this¹²:

‘It seems to me to be clear that if, either in consequence of the context or by virtue of the terms of the original gift [that was a gift under a will], what had passed to the claimant had been the right of personal use and occupation, the decision of Lord Chelmsford would have been the other way.’

b In other words, in all these cases you have to look not merely at the particular words, but also at the context; and here, looking at the words in the context, I am satisfied that the intention and meaning of this agreement is the one which involved residence by the wife. It follows, therefore, that that which has happened is not, as counsel for the wife contends, something which must be deemed to have been within the contemplation of the parties when they made this agreement. It is something which falls outside that contemplation, and therefore the court is in no way debarred or hindered by the terms of that agreement from considering whether or not there ought to be a variation, and if so what that variation ought to be, having regard to the new, un contemplated, circumstances which have arisen and have been proved.

c In the light of the circumstances which have been proved in this case, I take the view that it would be wrong to leave unvaried the term of the agreement which became a part of the undertaking in relation to the house—that is, that the husband should continue to make the house available for the wife’s use. I am inclined to think that the learned judge, had he regarded himself as free to give a different construction to the agreement, would have taken the same view. At any rate he expressed in no uncertain terms his sympathy towards the husband in respect of what had happened.

d I agree with the view expressed by Davies LJ that in these circumstances there ought to be a variation of the order in the manner which he has suggested.

e STAMP LJ. I agree. The house has not been made subject to any conveyance by the husband to the wife. It is not the subject of a devise or bequest. It is not the subject of any declaration of trust. As a matter of construction, I agree that the most that is conferred on the wife by the effect of the undertaking is a right to reside in the house so long as the undertaking remains in existence and so long as the period defined in it has not terminated.

f I safeguard myself by remarking that our attention has not been called to the terms of the introductory sections of the Settled Land Act 1925, and it has not been contended that the undertaking created a situation such as is, to the best of my recollection, referred to in those introductory sections.

g I agree that the wife obtained no interest, legal or equitable, in the house. She is, in my judgment, a mere licensee. I agree that the appeal should be allowed and that the husband should be released from his undertaking.

HOUSE OF LORDS

LORD REID, LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST, LORD DIPLOCK, LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE AND LORD KILBRANDON

11th, 12th JANUARY, 15th MARCH 1972

Selective employment tax – Premium – Payment of premium in respect of employment in, or carried out from, an establishment – Carried out from – Head office of employers constituting an establishment – Employers carrying out work on sites scattered all over United Kingdom – Site qualifying as an establishment – Central planning carried out at headquarters – Employees on site hired through headquarters where individually taken on and documents kept – Gross weekly pay calculated on site – Net pay calculated at headquarters – Whether employees on site in employment ‘carried out from’ headquarters – Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, s 1 (2).

The respondents were a subsidiary of a very large engineering company and had, inter alia, a manufacturing division and a construction division with their headquarters at Renfrew which was within a development area. The construction division was chiefly concerned with the installation and erection of steam raising plant manufactured by the respondents and to a lesser degree with repairs to such plant. The sites at which their operations were carried out were scattered over the United Kingdom. The co-ordinated work programme was carried out at the respondents' Renfrew headquarters. The contract at each site was under the charge of a sponsor engineer at Renfrew and under the day-to-day charge of a resident engineer who had no financial authority. Employees working at the sites were all employed through the Renfrew headquarters, by whom they were individually taken on and where their documents were kept. Gross weekly pay was calculated at the site and the wages records were sent to Renfrew where the net pay was calculated. A cheque to cover the total sum of wages was sent from Renfrew to each site where the wage packets were made up. One of the respondents' sites was at Didcot where they held the head contract for the construction of a power station. 500 men were employed on the project which was expected to last between three and four years. As the respondents were the main contractors, the site manager co-ordinated the work of the sub-contractors and had power to vary the terms of the sub-contracts. The respondents had erected a number of temporary buildings on the site to house their administration staff, to provide stores and workshops, and to serve as messing and changing rooms. The respondents claimed to be entitled to regional employment premiums (i.e. payments additional to the refund of selective employment tax) in respect of employees at Didcot on the ground that they were, within the meaning of s 1 (2)^a of the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, engaged in ‘employment... carried out from’ their ‘establishment’ at Renfrew. It was common ground that the respondents' headquarters at Renfrew constituted an ‘establishment’ and that, as the establishment was in a development area, the respondents were, under s 26 (1)^b of the Finance Act 1967, entitled to regional employment premiums in respect of persons engaged in employment in or carried out from that establishment. Didcot however was not in a development area and accordingly, under s 1 (2)^c of the Revenue Act 1968, regional employment premiums could not be claimed in respect a of persons engaged in employment in or carried out from an establishment there. The issues arose therefore whether the site at Didcot constituted an 'establishment' within s 1 (2) of the 1966 Act and, if so, whether the respondents' employees at the Didcot site could nevertheless be said to be engaged in employment carried out 'from' the Renfrew establishment.

b Held – (i) The Didcot site constituted an 'establishment' within s 1 (2) of the 1966 Act since the respondents had exclusive occupation of the premises, and there was a sufficient degree of permanence, the contract having several years to run, and a sufficient degree of organisation on the premises, both in relation to labour on the site and control over sub-contracts (see p 1132 a, p 1134 c, p 1135 h, p 1137 a and p 1140 j, post); dictum of Lord Parker CJ in Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity v Vic Hallam Ltd (1970) 5 ITR at 110 applied.

c (ii) The word 'employment' in s 1 (2) of the 1966 Act signified work carried out by employees under a contract of employment and not the act of entering a contract of employment; so far as employees at the Didcot site were concerned some, such as clerks, storekeepers and canteen staff, were employed in the establishment, and the remainder carried out their work from it on other parts of the site not forming part of the establishment; accordingly they were all engaged in 'employment in, or carried out from' the Didcot establishment within the meaning of s 1 (2) of the 1966 Act and it followed, therefore, that it could not be said that they were carrying out employment 'from' the Renfrew establishment; accordingly the respondents were not entitled to claim regional employment premiums in respect of those employees (see p 1132 a, p 1135 a to f and h, p 1137 b to d, p 1140 b and c, and p 1141 a d and g, post).

Appeal

This was an appeal by the Lord Advocate, as representing the Secretary of State for Employment, against an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session (the Lord President (Lord Clyde), Lord Johnston and Lord Cameron) dated 27th November 1970 refusing an appeal by the appellant against a decision by an industrial tribunal in Scotland dated 23rd April 1970 on a reference made to the tribunal by the respondents, Babcock & Wilcox (Operations) Ltd, under s 7 (5) of the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Kilbrandon.

j J P H Mackay QC, D R B Cay (both of the Scottish bar) and Thomas Bingham for the appellant.

A J Mackenzie Stuart QC and W D Cullen (both of the Scottish bar) for the respondents.

15th March. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD REID. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Kilbrandon. I entirely agree with regard to the Didcot establishment but I have more difficulty with regard to the three smaller sites. I do not think that it can have been intended that large numbers of small sites should be treated as separate establishments, nor do I think that it would be in anyone's interest to do this. But as the facts with regard to those three small sites are not given very fully I am prepared to treat them as borderline cases and to agree that they can be regarded as establishments. a b

I would therefore allow this appeal.

LORD MORRIS OF BORTH-Y-GEST. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in advance the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Kilbrandon, and I am in agreement with it. As we are differing from the Court of Session¹ and as our decision is of general application I will briefly express my view. c

After the introduction of selective employment tax (see s 44 of the Finance Act 1966), there were some provisions for a refund of it to the employer who had paid it. In certain cases (see s 1 of the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966) there could be a refund with a premium. In certain cases (see s 2 of that Act) there could be a refund but without a premium. In certain cases there was no refund at all. Then by s 26 (1) of the Finance Act 1967 there could in certain cases be an increased premium where there was a refund; that was known as a regional employment premium; that could become payable if the 'establishment' (a term to which I must more fully refer) was within a development area. Later (see s 1 (2) of the Revenue Act 1968) it was provided that no addition to the refund of tax should be added to a payment under s 1 of the 1966 Act unless the relevant 'establishment' was situated wholly within a development area. d e

The word 'establishment' is found in the 1966 Act. The conditions for a refund with a premium are to be found in s 1. Under that section the refund (with premium) is made by the Minister of Labour to an employer (a) who has paid selective employment tax, (b) for any contribution week, (c) in respect of a person in an employment to which the section applies. By s 1 (2), subject to an exception not now material, 'this section applies to any employment in, or carried out from, an establishment' satisfying certain conditions. f

The respondent company have a number of divisions including a manufacturing division and a construction division. The construction division is chiefly concerned with the installation and erection of steam raising plant, often of a very large size manufactured by the respondents. The construction division is also concerned (although to a lesser degree) with repairs to such plant. Both the manufacturing and construction divisions are based at Porterfield Road, Renfrew, where they occupy very large engineering premises. The work of installing and erecting plant must naturally be carried out at the place where it is desired to have the plant. The work of repairing plant must naturally be carried out wherever the plant is. So it followed that the respondents had many men working on sites in many different places. Many of these places were not within development areas. But Renfrew is. When the legislation to which I have referred resulted in differences concerning payments to certain employers according as to whether an 'establishment' was or was not within a development area the respondents wanted to know how they stood. So under s 7 (5) of the 1966 Act they submitted a question to the appropriate tribunal. It is important to see how the question was framed. It was as follows: g h i

'Whether the employees of [the respondents] employed on sites outside development areas during the period from 6th January to 6th July 1969 were employed from [the respondents'] establishment at Renfrew and whether [the

a respondents] are entitled to be paid regional payments in respect of these employees for the said period.'

It is to be noted that one part of the question was expressed as being whether those employed on sites were 'employed from' the respondents' establishment at Renfrew. This is not the language of s 1 and it is to the language of s 1 of the 1966 Act that attention must be paid.

b For the purposes of the hearing before the tribunal four sites were taken as example sites. They were sites at Didcot, Carrington, Fulham and Barking. Those sites are not within development areas. At Didcot the respondents were engaged in constructing a power station; at Carrington in installing a steam raising boiler; at Fulham and Barking in renewing and repairing steam raising plant. At Didcot the work was to last nearly four years. Over 500 people were to be concerned. At Fulham (to c take the site where as between the four sites the operations were on the smallest scale) the work was to last about one and a half years and initially there were 38 people concerned. The facts concerning the four sites are fully set out in the decision of the tribunal and I need not summarise them, but it is helpful to have in mind the nature of the labour forces at the sites. Some were 'travelling men'. They were employees of the respondents who had undertaken to work at any site within the d United Kingdom. Some were chosen by the labour officer (who is stationed at Renfrew) from persons who had applied to the respondents for work. Some came as the result of requests to the Department of Employment and Productivity who recruited on a nation-wide basis. Some were locally recruited from men who called at a site asking for work. Generally speaking, the work at the sites was planned and directed from Renfrew.

e The refund (with a premium) under s 1 of the 1966 Act will be made where the tax (for any contribution week) has been paid by an employer in respect of a person 'in an employment' to which the section applies; and (for present purposes) the section applies to any employment in, or carried out from, an establishment that satisfies certain conditions as set out in s 1 (2). One of these is that the 'establishment is engaged by way of business' in certain activities. If there was an 'establishment'

f at Renfrew it is common ground that it satisfied the statutory conditions. If there was an 'establishment' at each one of the four sites it is also common ground that each one satisfied the statutory conditions.

What, then, is an 'establishment'? Section 10 (2) of the 1966 Act refers to the site of an establishment; s 7 (1) deals with registers of establishments; s 7 (2) provides that no business or part of a business is to be registered except on the application of the employer. Section 1 (2) refers to an establishment being 'engaged by way of business'; it also refers to 'employed persons employed in any employment in, or carried out from, [an] establishment'. It would seem clear that where operations of any magnitude are to take place on a site (such as a place where a power station or a steam raising boiler is to be built or where plant is to be repaired) there would be need to have some premises (probably temporary buildings or sheds or huts) on the h site. It would be necessary to have places where men could report, places where they could resort, places where they were paid, places where records were kept, places where tools were kept or where stores or equipment were kept.

Some tests or indications as to what may constitute an establishment were set out by Lord Parker CJ in *Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity v Vic Hallam Ltd*². He mentioned 'exclusive occupation of premises'; 'some degree of permanence';

j 'some organisation on the premises, an organisation of the men who are working there'. So he said that one of the matters to be considered was whether it could properly be said that men are working in or from such premises. The tribunal were assisted by those tests or indications which Lord Parker CJ formulated and stated that it was not in dispute that there was an establishment at the Renfrew works. As regards the four sites the tribunal held as follows:

'On each of the four sites described in evidence there was sufficient in the way of premises within the exclusive occupation of the [respondents], of permanence and of organisation of activities of the men working on the site to constitute an establishment at each site. Moreover, for all men working on the site the site establishment is one from which in some sense they are employed. It is the one to which they report each day; at which they receive their orders and from which they go to the constructional sites to carry out their work. It is the one from which they collect their wages and to which they make complaints and address enquiries.'

The conclusion which the tribunal reached that at each one of the four sites there was an 'establishment' was in my view correct; it was a conclusion amply warranted from the facts as found.

As to the Renfrew works, where there was an 'establishment' the tribunal posed the question whether it was the establishment 'from which the employment of men on sites outwith development areas is carried out'. The tribunal said:

'The Renfrew works have a good claim to be so regarded. These works are the establishment to which each employee applies for employment; from which he is paid and dismissed; where all his labour records are kept; where most of the planning is done; and from which supervision and instruction proceed. In the case of those employees of the [respondents] who are travelling men, sites may come and sites may go but Renfrew remains as the centre from which they are employed and by which they are transferred from one site to another. For men locally employed, the picture is rather different. No doubt they are engaged, paid and dismissed by the labour officer at Renfrew but their local site is the only establishment of the [respondents] with which they have any connection.'

The tribunal proceeded to say that it would be prepared to hold that there were two establishments 'from' each of which, in some sense, employees working at sites 'were employed'. It considered that it had to make a choice because the relevant statutory provisions envisaged that for each person there is only one establishment 'in or from which his employment is carried out'. It chose Renfrew because, taking the 'travelling men', Renfrew 'was the place from which travelling men transferred from other sites should be considered as having been employed'; and that no distinction should be made in the case of travelling men working at sites at which they had commenced employment with the respondents. Although the tribunal considered that a better case could be made for treating 'local men' as employed at and from the sites where they worked it decided on balance that they should be treated as being 'employed from Renfrew'. That was because all important matters relating to their employment were handled at Renfrew and because their employment was controlled from there. No distinction could be drawn between the four sites.

The several references made by the tribunal to the conception of men being employed 'from' Renfrew were in line with the decision which was arrived at. It was in the following terms:

'... that the employees of the [respondents] employed on sites at Didcot, Carrington, Fulham and Barking during the period from 6th January 1969 to 6th July 1969 were employed from the [respondent company's] establishment at Renfrew and the [respondent company] are entitled to be paid regional payments in respect of these employees for the said period.'

With every respect, it seems to me that the tribunal's approach and finding involved a departure from the language of the statute. For an employer to be entitled under a s 1 of the 1966 Act he must have paid selective employment tax (for a contribution week) in respect of a person 'in an employment' to which that section applies; and the statutory provision applies 'to any employment in, or carried out from, an establishment' satisfying certain conditions. It being found and accepted that there is an establishment (satisfying the conditions) at each one of the four sites, the question in b reference to a person employed at one of the sites was not whether it could be said that he was in one sense employed 'from' Renfrew, but whether he was in employment in or carried out from the establishment at the site. If someone was engaged in clerical work that involved his working indoors in one of the temporary huts or buildings erected on a site it could not rationally be said that he was working in the Renfrew establishment. If someone was engaged in outdoor work such as that of constructing a power station at a site it seems to me that he would be in employment carried out from the establishment at the site. It would not be a normal use of c language to say that he was in employment carried out from the establishment at Renfrew. In the context of s 1 of the 1966 Act I think that the notion of an employment being 'carried out' denotes a carrying out by the person who is employed; he will carry out his employment at the place where he works. The word 'employment' involves that there is someone who employs because he wants some work to be done and that there is someone who is employed and who agrees to do the work.

d In s 1 of the 1966 Act I think that the primary reference which is made by the words 'employment . . . carried out' is a reference to the person employed. He is the person who is 'in an employment'. He carries out that employment and he carries it out from some base or establishment. Those on the sites were carrying out their employment from those sites. The work they were doing was directed from Renfrew and because of the internal arrangements of the respondents it could be said that in one sense they were employed 'from' Renfrew. The conception of being employed 'from' a place is a difficult one, but whether it is or is not it is not one that is expressed in or that is inherent in the language of the statute. The statute enjoins the enquiry whether persons work in a qualifying establishment or whether they carry out their work from such an establishment.

f On the facts as found by the tribunal their decision should have been that the employees employed at the four sites during the period referred to were in employment in or carried out from the respective establishments at the sites and that the respondents were not entitled to be paid regional payments in respect of those employees for the period referred to.

g We were referred to the decision of the Divisional Court in *Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity v Clarke Chapman & Co Ltd*³. The facts in that case were closely parallel to the facts in this case. In line with practice in revenue and taxation matters the Divisional Court followed the decision of the Court of Session⁴ in the present case while indicating, for the reasons given by Widgery LJ, that their own view would have led them to an opposite decision. I find myself in agreement with the reasons expressed by Widgery LJ.

h I would allow the appeal.

LORD DIPLOCK. My Lords, I agree with the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Kilbrandon, and for the reasons which he gives would allow this appeal.

j LORD SIMON OF GLAISDALE, My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in advance the speeches prepared by my noble and learned friends, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest and Lord Kilbrandon, with which I agree.

As its name implies, the selective employment tax was imposed with a view to fiscal discrimination between different sorts of employment—even though the original taxing provision, s 44 of the Finance Act 1966, on which all subsequent provisions depend, itself provided no element of discrimination. A significant feature of the tax—as indeed also of concomitant statutory provisions which did provide the discrimination—is that it was weekly in temporal scope. a

3 [1971] 2 All ER 798, [1971] 1 WLR 1094

The first of these concomitant statutory provisions was the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966. When taken together with s 44 of the Finance Act 1966, it provided (to speak very broadly) for fiscal discrimination in favour of employment in productive industry and against employment in service industry. The second concomitant statutory provision, contained in s 26 (1) of the Finance Act 1967, when taken together with the provisions of the previous Acts to which I have referred, provided for fiscal discrimination in favour of employment in development areas (i.e. areas of higher incidence of unemployment) and thus against employment in other areas (i.e. areas of higher incidence of employment). b

It will be immediately apparent that the decision appealed from involves a result which must be directly contrary to what Parliament intended in 1967. It involves that employers and employees in areas of high or higher incidence of unemployment are taxed to subsidise the employment of people, including those recruited locally, in areas of high or higher incidence of employment (e.g. south-east England). Normally such a conclusion would be the end of the case; a decision directly contrary to what Parliament so plainly intended must be wrong. c

In the instant situation, however, the matter cannot be disposed of thus summarily. The 1967 Act can only operate within the framework of the 1966 Acts; and, as I have pointed out, the discriminatory purpose of the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966 is not the same as that of s 26 of the Finance Act 1967. Nevertheless, although even the manifest intention of a later Act can rarely control the construction of an earlier Act, it is legitimate, in my view, if there is any dubiety as to the construction of the earlier Act, to resolve this in favour of giving effect to the manifest intention of the later Act. This is particularly so when the earliest provision of all merely lays a general foundation (here, for discrimination between employments—potentially on widely different grounds) and where the ensuing particular provisions operate in perfect harmony. d

In any case, even looking no further than the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, the appellant is, in my judgment, entitled to succeed. There are three crucial terms or phrases which fall for interpretation in their instant context: 'establishment', 'employment' and 'carried out from'. 'Establishment' is a word of wide meaning. Among other, different, senses, it can signify, on the one hand, a body of persons (generally an organised body) or, on the other hand, premises—with a number of senses intermediate between these two. I think that any attempt at exhaustive judicial definition would be inappropriate where the draftsman himself has not attempted to define; but what this word conveys to me in its instant context is a body of persons carrying on activities by way of business (see Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, s 1 (2) (a)) associated with a locality. I think that the criteria suggested by Lord Parker CJ in *Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity v Vic Hallam Ltd*⁵ are relevant and likely to be helpful in deciding in particular cases whether what is in question amounts to an 'establishment'. A further criterion that might be useful in some cases (although possibly inherent in Lord Parker CJ's third and fourth criteria) would be to ascertain where lies the effective control of the activities of those whose 'employment' (the term next for consideration) is in question—which in turn would involve consideration of how far and in what respects control is delegated. (In all four cases under instant consideration, control of employment was so delegated as to be effectively exercised at the local site and not at Renfrew.) I would not, for myself, add size as a further criterion—partly because of difficulty in drawing the differentiating line, but even more because a number of small units of employment e a could cumulatively be significant for the purposes of the relevant Act.

The tribunal found that the respondents had 'establishments' in all four localities in question. I would have found so myself on the available evidence; in any case, it is sufficient to say there was material which justified the findings of the tribunal.

b Then for 'employment'. In the context of these Acts the word signifies to me work done under a contract of employment. I do not think it means the contract of employment itself, nor the contractual relationship simpliciter. I can see no reason for considering it from the point of view of the employer; on the contrary, if anything turns on the choice, I think it should be considered from the point of view of the employee, since it is his employment (i.e. work) which the Act contemplates as the subject-matter of discrimination.

c Thirdly, employment 'carried out from' an establishment. I think that this means no more than that the employees whose employment is in question are, in popular language, 'based on' a particular establishment. The employees whose employment is in question in the instant appeals were based on the establishments at the local sites. They were not based on Renfrew; so that their employment was not 'carried out from' any establishment there. To hold that it was 'carried out from' there was a misdirection.

d I desire to add only two further matters. First, I agree with the observations of Widgery L.J. in *Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity v Clarke Chapman & Co Ltd*⁶, although not with the conclusion to which the court felt bound out of comity. Secondly, once there is an 'establishment', it does not cease to be such merely because it is running down. In businesses like the respondents' the activities are bound to build up and run down. In this connection, the situation must, in view of the temporal incidence of tax, refund and premium, be considered from week to week. The provisions relating to registration of establishments contained in s 7 of the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966 are also important in considering problems of build-up and run-down—in particular, sub-s (1) (whereby the Minister is not required to make payment for any contribution week falling wholly or partly before the date of registration of the establishment) and sub-s (3) (whereby the Minister may, subject to reference to the tribunal, remove from the register any establishment which he is

f I would allow the appeal.

LORD KILBRANDON, My Lords, before coming to the closer examination of the relevant statutory provisions which will be necessary for the disposal of this appeal, I propose to describe as briefly as possible the scheme of the selective employment tax (SET) and its associated benefits. The tax was imposed by s 44 of the Finance Act 1966 which provided:

g '(1) . . . in respect of each contribution week beginning on or after 5th September 1966, an employer shall be liable, in respect of each person in respect of whom the employer is liable to pay an employer's insurance contribution for that week, to pay'

h SET, the amount of the weekly payment being regulated by the age and sex of each employed person. The tax was to be collected together with the employer's weekly contributions in respect of his employees. In spite of the name of the tax, there is in the instituting statute no element of selection to be found. For that you must go to the Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, which was passed more or less contemporaneously; I shall call it 'the 1966 Act', since it will not be necessary to refer to the Finance Act 1966 again.

j Section 2 of the 1966 Act provides for 'selective employment refund', namely, the repayment of the tax paid to an employer who has paid SET for any contribution week in respect of a person in an employment to which the section applies. Section 1 of the Act provides for 'selective employment premium'; not only does the employer receive repayment of the SET he has paid in respect of a person in an employment to which that section applies, but also a premium calculated by reference to that person's age and sex. Section 3 of the 1966 Act provides for payment of selective employment refund and of selective employment premium to employers who may be classified as public undertakers, on the same principle as those payments are to be made to employers in the private sector under ss 1 and 2.

In both ss 1 and 2, the employment to which the sections apply is 'employment in, or carried out from' establishments having certain characteristics. Putting the matter broadly, and using language which is not intended to compromise the questions which are in issue, the policy of Parliament appears to have been to confer repayment in respect of employment in some forms of industrial activity, to confer repayment plus a premium in respect of others, and for the rest to leave the SET paid to be retained by the Treasury.

SET, with its associated refunds and premiums, has been made the vehicle of a second policy, namely, the conferring of benefit and encouragement on the development areas. These are areas in which there is a higher than average rate of unemployment, and a lower than average rate of industrial development. By s 26 (1) of the Finance Act 1967 the selective employment premium payable under s 1 of the 1966 Act is increased, in respect of development areas, by an amount called the regional employment premium. A further discrimination in favour of development areas is effected by s 1 of the Revenue Act 1968, whereby the premium payable, in addition to refund of tax, under s 1 of the 1966 Act, is no longer to be payable except—again to use non-statutory language—in respect of development areas. These payments, namely, the refund of tax, the selective employment premium, and the regional employment premium have been compendiously and conveniently termed 'the regional payment' by the industrial tribunal which dealt with the present case. The question before us is whether the respondent employers are entitled to regional payment in respect of the employment of certain of their employees who work in areas which are not development areas and whose situation I am about to describe.

The respondents are a subsidiary of Babcock & Wilcox Ltd; they have their registered office and their head office in London, where are stationed their planning and engineering staff, as also the main design drawing offices. They are organised in a number of divisions. The division with which we are concerned is the construction division, which is based at Renfrew, in a development area. That division is chiefly concerned with the installation and erection of steam raising plant, manufactured by the respondents' manufacturing division, also situated at Renfrew, and to a lesser extent with repairs to such plant. The sites on which their operations are carried on are scattered over the United Kingdom. The allocation of functions as between the divisional headquarters at Renfrew and the personnel actually on the sites where the construction is proceeding has been carefully described in the tribunal's reasons for their decision, and I shall only summarise it here. Renfrew (as I shall describe the division's headquarters there) prepares what is called the 'critical path network', which I take to mean a co-ordinated work programme. Each contract is under the charge of a sponsor engineer at Renfrew, and under the day-to-day charge of a resident engineer. The resident engineer, except for being in charge of a small cash float, has no financial authority. Nor can he alter the critical path network, although he can recommend alterations to the sponsor engineer.

When it comes to labour, with which of course this appeal is primarily concerned, the position is that there are several classes of employee, some being 'travelling men' who may move from site to site, and some being specially recruited at the Department of Employment and Productivity for a contract, or accepted for employment locally at the site. Neither party in this case distinguishes in any way, for present purposes, between the classes of labour; it is enough to say that all are hired through Renfrew, a by whom they are individually taken on, and where their documents are kept. So also their employment is terminated by Renfrew, except for misconduct, when the resident engineer can dismiss. Gross weekly pay is calculated at the site, and the wages records go to Renfrew, where the net pay is calculated. Renfrew sends a cheque to cover the total sum of wages to the site, where the wage packets are prepared and handed over to the employees.

b When the question came to be raised between the Secretary of State for Employment and the respondents whether, in respect of the persons employed at the many sites where the respondents' contracts are being carried out, not being sites within development areas, the respondents were entitled to regional payment, it was agreed to test the matter by reference to four individual sites, namely, those at Didcot, Carrington, Fulham and Barking. No distinction was sought to be made in principle among these sites by either party for the purposes of this appeal, although the sites
c differ greatly in size and character. I shall take first Didcot as exhibiting, in my opinion, most clearly the factors which will lead to a decision affecting all.

At Didcot the respondents hold the head contract for the construction of a power station on behalf of the Central Electricity Generating Board. It is a large project, on which about 500 men are employed, and the work is expected to last for between d three and four years. The respondents have erected a number of temporary buildings on the site to house their administration staff, to provide stores and workshops, and to serve as messing and changing rooms. In 1969 the assessment to local rates in respect of these buildings amounted to £1,263. The arrangements as to the preparation of plans, the critical path network, and the engagement and administration of labour are in accordance with the general practice I have outlined above. There is this e special feature arising out of the fact that at Didcot the respondents are the main contractors; the site manager, who is responsible to Renfrew, co-ordinates the work of the sub-contractors, and has power to vary the terms of the sub-contracts.

The question whether the respondents are entitled to regional employment premium payments in respect of their employees at Didcot will depend in the first place on the exact terms of the Finance Act 1967. Section 26 (1) provides that the premium f is payable:

'Where, in the case of a person in an employment to which section 1 of the principal Act [i.e. the 1966 Act] applies in respect of whom a payment under that section falls to be made to the employer, the establishment in or from which that employment is carried out is situated wholly within a development area . . .'

The words I have italicised appear first in s 1 (2) of the 1966 Act; selective employment
g premium, as provided for in the preceding subsection, is applied 'to any employment in, or carried out from, an establishment' fulfilling certain conditions. It is, therefore, plain that the meaning of the words contained in the 1967 Act may be interpreted by reference to the former Act. The phrase is used continually throughout the code, for example, in s 7 (1) of the 1966 Act in connection with the keeping and maintaining of registers of establishments for the purposes of ss 1 and 2, in s 26 (1) of the 1967 Act, h as pointed out, in connection with regional employment premium, and in s 1 (6) of the 1968 Act, in connection with the confining of the payment of premiums to development areas.

The phrase contains two words which may be equivocal—'establishment' and 'employment'. An establishment may be either incorporeal (an abstraction), or local (a place). The National Coal Board is an establishment in the first sense, so is its
i headquarters in Westminster in the second. I am satisfied that here the word is used in the second sense. In my opinion, the remaining words of the phrase make that clear. You could perhaps colloquially, although not accurately, say that a man's employment was in the National Coal Board, but you could not say that it was carried out from the National Coal Board, although it might well be carried out from the headquarters in Westminster. Section 10 of the 1966 Act provides by sub-s (2) that if access between all parts of an area comprised in the premises occupied by an employer is not available without leaving the premises of the employer, then each part is to be treated as the site of a separate establishment, and goes on in sub-s (3) to speak of premises 'constituting the site of a single establishment'. Again, s 1 (3) of the 1968 Act provides for the withdrawal of selective employment premiums from public undertakings unless the employment 'is employment at or from places situated wholly within a development area'. Here the word 'places', in the case of public undertakings, is made exactly the equivalent of 'establishments' in the private sector. a

'Employment' may mean the act of entering into a contract of employment—as Lord Cameron put it in the Court of Session⁷, 'the employer's employment of the employee'—or it may mean, quite simply, work. I prefer the latter interpretation. I do not think it is helpful to attempt a sharp discrimination between looking to the activity of the employer and looking to the activity of the employee, but certainly the words of the statute seem to be concentrating on the latter. It is the employee who 'carries out' the employment, and that must show where the primary emphasis lies. So I would paraphrase, for this purpose, the word 'employment' as 'work carried out by a person under a contract of employment'. b

In the light of these interpretations, accordingly, the first question is whether the tribunal was right in holding that there is an establishment at Didcot within the meaning of the statute in which the word is used. That the respondents have such an establishment at Renfrew is not in question. The word 'establishment' has not received any statutory definition, but in *Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity v Vic Hallam Ltd*⁸, Lord Parker CJ laid down some guidelines: c

'For my part I find it quite impossible to give any exclusive definition or test as to what constitutes an establishment. The tribunal said that they approached the matter as one of broad common sense. For my part I think that is the correct approach in deciding whether as a matter of fact and degree any particular premises do constitute an establishment. But as it seems to me there are certain indications which help in the matter. The first is one to which I have already referred, exclusive occupation of premises; secondly some degree of permanence—both those are present in this case—and thirdly, as it seems to me, some organisation on the premises, an organisation of the men who are working there. Finally, the question whether a particular premises is an establishment is bound up with the question of where the men who are working there are being employed in or from, because by section 1 (2) it is provided that: "... this section applies to any employment in, or carried out from, an establishment ... " therefore an establishment must be a place in which or from which people are employed. One of the matters, therefore, to be considered in considering whether premises are an establishment, is whether it can be properly said that men are working in or from that establishment. When one finds, as here, a place in which there is no organisation of staff whatsoever, no administration is carried out, then there is a strong pointer, as it seems to me, to it not being an establishment.' d

This passage has been referred to with approval by a Divisional Court in *Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity v Clarke Chapman & Co Ltd*⁹, and by the Court of Session¹⁰ in the present case. I would wish to follow the guidelines there laid down, which lead me to the conclusion that Didcot is an establishment in the relevant sense. The respondents have exclusive occupation of premises, this very large contract had several years to run, and, apart from the labour organisation on the site, there is the exercise by the site manager of control over the sub-contracts. e a If, then, Didcot is an establishment, the position of the workers is, in my opinion, that some, such as clerks and storekeepers, workshop fitters and canteen staff, are employed in the establishment, and the remainder carry out their work from it on other parts of the site not forming part of the establishment. Here I agree with the conclusion of the tribunal. After pointing out that the requirements laid down by Lord Parker CJ are clearly satisfied, the tribunal goes on:

b 'Moreover, for all men working on the site the site establishment is one from which in some sense they are employed. It is the one to which they report each day; at which they receive their orders and from which they go to the constructional sites to carry out their work. It is the one from which they collect their wages and to which they make complaints and address enquiries.'

c It is in the next sentence, however, that I cannot agree with the tribunal.

'If not constrained by statute to make a choice, we would be prepared to say that there were two establishments from each of which, in some sense, employees working at sites were employed'

—the second site, of course, being Renfrew. Here, in my view, the tribunal mis-directed themselves. No doubt the men were, in some sense, employed from Renfrew, but that is not the relevant consideration. The question being, from what establishment did they carry out their employment? then, for those that were not employed in the Didcot establishment, it seems to me there is only one answer.

d A precisely similar question came before a Divisional Court in Clarke Chapman & Co Ltd's case¹¹. The court followed the decision of the Court of Session¹² in the present case, and did so on the ground that it is the practice in revenue and taxation matters that the English courts should endeavour to keep in line with the courts of Scotland. At the same time the court made it plain that they did not agree with that decision. I agree with the criticisms of the Court of Session judgment¹² as stated by Widgery LJ, and concurred in by Lord Parker CJ and Bean J. The basis of the Court of Session's judgment¹² is that you have here men some of whom are employed in the establishment at Didcot, but all from the establishment at Renfrew, and that the employers have therefore in respect of all the men satisfied one of the two conditions either of which would have entitled them to regional payments. As I have indicated, I do not think it is correct to say that the men at Didcot carry out their employment there from Renfrew. In my view, the statutes were not envisaging any such possibility. In most industrial concerns the men work in the establishment, but in some rather exceptional employments, like the present, while all the employees are based on the establishment, some go out to work from it. That is the reason for the propounding of the alternative in the statutory phrase. The employment of the persons at Didcot, accordingly, is not, in my opinion, employment in or carried out from an establishment situated within a development area.

e The cases of Carrington, Fulham and Barking are not so clear. The projects are very much smaller in scale, and we are told very little about the physical nature of the respondents' premises on the sites. However, for the following reasons I think the decision in relation to them should be governed by the decision for Didcot. First; the parties did not distinguish them either before the tribunal, the Court of Session¹², or this House. Secondly, the general considerations, as far as labour is concerned, are the same as for the establishment at Didcot. Thirdly, the contracts at Fulham and f Barking, employing now comparatively few men, are running down; assuming that at their inception they were, for present purposes, indistinguishable in principle from Didcot, and were establishments on their own, we have no materials on which we could decide at what stage, if ever, their character changed.

SACHS, EDMUND DAVIES AND STEPHENSON LJJ

12th, 13th JANUARY 1972

Nuisance – Public nuisance – Obstruction of highway – Liability for damages – Basis of liability – Causation – Negligence – Danger – Accident causing injury to plaintiff – Nuisance as cause of accident – Relevance of negligence in creating obstruction – Obstruction as a source of danger – Vehicle parked on highway – Vehicle constituting a public nuisance – Parking of vehicle not negligent – Collision of motor cycle with parked vehicle injuring pillion passenger – Accident wholly caused by negligence of driver of motor cycle – Nuisance not a cause of accident – Nuisance not a source of danger.

A long distance lorry driver loaded his employer's lorry and, at about 6.00 p.m. on an August bank holiday, parked it beneath a street lamp in a northerly direction on the northbound side of a dual carriageway road intending to move it at about 4.00 a.m. on the following day. The carriageways were each 24 ft in width and were divided by a central reservation. The lorry, which was 7½ ft wide, was parked on the outside of a very shallow right hand bend and accordingly about 16 ft of the carriageway was left unobstructed for northbound traffic to pass between the offside of the lorry and the central reservation. At lighting-up time the lorry driver put on his tail lights; the street lamps were alight affording excellent illumination. To approaching traffic there was nothing to obstruct the view of the lorry for a distance of at least 200 yards. A motor cyclist, with the plaintiff riding on the pillion, failed to look where he was going and collided with the stationary lorry. The plaintiff was injured. There was no mist or fog or other traffic hazards at the relevant time and the traffic was light. The plaintiff having recovered judgment in default of defence against the driver of the motor cycle sought to recover damages against the owner and the driver of the lorry on the ground that they were negligent in the manner in which the driver had parked the lorry, or alternatively that the leaving of the lorry on the highway constituted a public nuisance. The trial judge found that the accident was wholly the fault of the driver of the motor cycle and held that the parking of the lorry was not negligent and did not constitute a nuisance. On appeal, Held – The parking of a large vehicle for many hours on the highway constituted an obstruction which resulted in a nuisance being created, for part of the highway was thereby removed from public use; the owner and driver of the lorry were not however liable for the plaintiff's injuries because (i) (per Sachs and Stephenson LJ) the sole cause of the accident being the motor cyclist's negligence, it followed that the nuisance created by the defendants was not a cause of the accident; (ii) (per Edmund Davies LJ) the nuisance did not present a danger to those using the highway in the manner in which they could have been expected to use it (see p 1146 f to h, p 1147 b and f, p 1150 j, and p 1152 c, post).

Per Sachs and Stephenson LJ. It may well be that a person who has created a nuisance by obstructing the highway would be liable in nuisance even though an

- a action in negligence would fail, if an unexpected supervening event has occurred, e.g. the sudden failure of rear lights on a vehicle, which so affects the situation that the obstruction becomes the cause of the accident (see p 1147 g to j and p 1152 c, post).

- b Per Edmund Davies LJ. In order that a plaintiff may succeed in an action for personal injuries caused by a collision with an obstruction constituting a public nuisance, he must establish that the obstruction constituted a danger; furthermore fault on the part of the defendant is essential to liability in the sense that it must appear that a reasonable man would be bound to realise the likelihood of risk to highway users resulting from the presence of the obstructing vehicle on the road; where, however, an obstruction is shown to be a danger the person who created it is liable unless he can show sufficient justification or excuse (see p 1148 h and p 1150 b and e to g, post).

Appeal

- h This was an appeal by the plaintiff, Paul Leslie Dymond, against the judgment of Bridge J at Exeter Assizes dated 25th June 1971, dismissing the plaintiff's action for damages for personal injuries and consequential loss suffered as the result of an accident in which a motor cycle which was being driven by the first defendant, Christopher Albert Pearce, and on the pillion of which the plaintiff was being carried, ran into a stationary lorry which was owned by the second defendant, Ranco Controls Ltd, and had been parked on the highway by the third defendant, the driver, Alfred George Noonan. The plaintiff recovered judgment in default of defence against the first defendant and sought to recover damages against the second and third defendants. The facts are set out in the judgment of Sachs LJ.

SACHS LJ. This is an appeal from a judgment of Bridge J¹ given at Exeter Assizes on 25th June 1971. On that occasion there came before the learned judge the claim of a pillion riding passenger on a motor cycle. The driver of that motor cycle had in Wolseley Road, Plymouth, driven it into the back of a large stationary lorry at about 9.45 p.m. on 29th August 1966, a bank holiday. The plaintiff passenger having recovered judgment in default of defence against the driver of the motor cycle, who was the first defendant, was seeking at assizes to recover damages also against the second and third defendants, who were respectively the owner and driver of the lorry. The case against those two defendants was founded on alleged negligence and alternatively on alleged nuisance. The learned trial judge, however, found against the plaintiff on both issues. Hence this appeal.

‘Wolseley Road, Plymouth, carries at certain times of day a substantial volume of traffic. It is in a built-up area, and subject to the statutory speed limit of 30 mph. In the relevant length it is divided into twin carriageways by a central reservation which is broken at points to allow traffic to cross into side streets or to make “U” turns. Each carriageway is some 24 feet in width. The lorry, which was parked by the [third defendant], was on the outside of a very shallow right-hand bend in the northbound carriageway. The lorry was some 7½ feet wide; accordingly it left unobstructed not less than 16 feet of the carriageway for north-bound traffic to pass between the offside of the lorry and the central reservation. The time of the accident, as I have already indicated, was 9.45 p.m. late in August after lighting-up time. The street lamps in Wolseley Road were alight; they afforded excellent illumination. The lorry was parked immediately beneath a street lamp and its lights were also properly illuminated. Approaching the point where the lorry was parked in a northerly direction, as was the [first defendant], there was nothing whatever to obstruct the view of the parked lorry for a distance of at least 200 yards. I am quite satisfied on the evidence that this accident happened for one reason only, namely that the [first defendant] simply was not looking where he was going. If he had been, the accident could not have occurred, because there was the lorry plain for all to see. I have heard the evidence of a Miss Lashbrook, which I accept. She and another girl with two boys, all in their teens, were standing on the pavement talking and laughing together as the motor cycle passed by, and her evidence is that both the [first defendant] and the [plaintiff] turned to look at the group on the pavement. They waved and one of them shouted. It is quite plain to my mind that it was because the [first defendant], perhaps in a Bank Holiday mood, allowed his attention to be distracted in that way from the road ahead of him that he reached a position, travelling as he himself says, at a speed of 30 to 35 mph, so close behind the lorry before he realised it was in his path, and when he did realise that it was too late to take avoiding action.’

How the lorry came to be parked on that dual carriageway was stated in the course of some further findings of the learned trial judge. He referred to the fact that the third defendant lived in a semi-detached house, 37 Wordsworth Crescent. That crescent ran parallel to Wolseley Road, but on the opposite side of the carriageway where the lorry was parked. The third defendant’s house fronted on to Wordsworth Crescent; it had no traffic entrance on to the Wolseley Road, nor, so far as we were informed, had it any other access to it beyond a common passageway leading from Wolseley Road to Wordsworth Crescent. In one sense, however, it can properly be said that the Wordsworth Crescent houses backed on to Wolseley Road. Wordsworth a Crescent was an extremely narrow residential street and one in which it was quite impracticable to park a large lorry. The third defendant on this occasion had gone to his employer's, the second defendant's, premises some five miles away from his home at about 5.00 p m having in mind a long journey which he was going to make with the lorry the next day. He loaded the lorry in question and then drove it back towards his home with a view to making an early start on a drive to London the following morning at about 4.00 a m. He adopted that course for his own convenience, b as he preferred this way of doing his work to fetching the lorry from the second defendant's premises in the early morning. He parked it in Wolseley Road at about 6.00 p m and in due course he went and turned on the lights when lighting-up time came.

c So far as negligence is concerned, it is sufficient to say that the finding of the learned trial judge in favour of the defendants was right. To park a lorry, even of the size of the one under consideration, under a good street lamp on a one-way carriage track 24 ft wide with its tail lights on at the appropriate time cannot be said to be negligent, at any rate when there was no evidence of difficulties likely to be caused to traffic (the traffic was said to be light at the relevant time), or as to the risk of heavy mist or fog supervening. Moreover, the lorry was parked in that position on a bend which d is the more likely to be clear of other vehicles pursuing a normal course.

Accordingly, in this court the real challenge concerned the learned trial judge's finding on the issue of nuisance. He held that the leaving of the lorry on the highway did not constitute a nuisance; that even if it did, damage of the kind suffered was not a foreseeable consequence; and, moreover, that the nuisance was not in any event the cause of the accident.

e The first question to be answered is whether or not this lorry when left on the main road from 6.00 p m with a view to its not being moved until 4.00 a m constituted at 9.45 p m an obstruction of the highway which in law should be held to be a nuisance. It is at the outset to be observed that it was conceded by counsel for the second and third defendants, that there was no question in this case of the third defendant being able in relation to the road where the lorry was left to assert any special right as being the occupier of adjoining premises. That was an inevitable f concession, in view of the fact, already mentioned, that 37 Wordsworth Crescent had no traffic exit on to Wolseley Road; nor was the lorry parked on the Crescent side of the road. It follows that the question whether the lorry constituted an obstruction falls to be determined in the same way as if the driver was any other vehicle user who had no such special rights.

g The law on the question as to what constitutes a public nuisance in a highway is plain, despite the fact that in certain authorities cited to us dealing with wholly different sets of facts there can be found phrases apt to deal with those facts which, if taken out of context, could impair the clarity of the position. The relevant law is compactly stated in the judgment of Sir Raymond Evershed MR in *Trevett v Lee*³ where he said:

h 'The law as regards obstructions to highways is conveniently stated in a passage in SALMOND ON TORTS⁴: "A nuisance to a highway consists either in obstructing it or in rendering it dangerous" and then a number of examples are given. I will not take up time reading them, but a reference to these examples seems to me to show that prima facie, at any rate, when one speaks of an obstruction to a highway one means something which permanently or temporarily removes the whole or part of the highway from the public use altogether.'

The phrase there quoted from the 11th edition of Salmond on Torts is again to be found in the current edition⁵, with a footnote accurately referring to the fact that it had been approved by Sir Raymond Evershed MR. a

Next one can find in the judgment of Denning LJ in *Morton v Wheeler*⁶ a statement which is relevant, although the case itself was concerned with danger arising from some 'sharp, fearsome-looking spikes' bordering the highway. There Denning LJ clearly recognised the existence of these two categories of nuisance affecting a highway when he said: b

'As all lawyers know, the tort of public nuisance is a curious mixture. It covers a multitude of sins. We are concerned today with only one of them, namely, a danger in or adjoining a highway. This is different, I think, from an obstruction in the highway. If a man wrongfully obstructs a highway, or makes it less commodious for others (without making it dangerous) he is guilty of a public nuisance because he interferes with the right of the public to pass along it freely. [Then a little later he said:] Danger stands, however, on a different footing from obstruction.' c

When looking at authorities concerned with highway nuisances it is important to remember that there are these two categories, because otherwise phrases relating to the second—danger—category may be read as necessarily applying to the first—simple obstruction. It is, however, prima facie common to both categories—which can in fact overlap—that in neither is it necessary to prove negligence as an ingredient (see per Lord Simonds in *Read v J Lyons & Co Ltd*⁷, per Devlin J in *Farrell v John Mowlem & Co Ltd*⁸, and per Denning LJ in *Morton v Wheeler*⁶); that in both proof of what is prima facie a nuisance lays the onus on the defendant to prove justification (compare *Southport Corporation v Esso Petroleum Co Ltd*⁹); and that, of course, neither is actionable—in the sense that a claim for damages can succeed—unless the plaintiff can establish that damage has actually been caused to him by the nuisance. d

Leaving on one side those in somewhat special positions, such as frontagers, the common law rights of users of highways are normally confined to use for passage and repassage and for incidents usually associated with such use, such as temporary halts and those emergency stops which often give rise to difficulties, and have had to be considered in a number of authorities. The leaving of a large vehicle on a highway for any other purpose for a considerable period (it is always a matter of degree) otherwise than in a lay-by prima facie results in a nuisance being created, for it narrows the highway. With all respect to the views expressed by the learned trial judge as to the ways of life today, I am unable to accept his conclusion that the parking for many hours for the driver's own convenience of a large lorry on a highway of sufficient importance to have a dual carriageway did not result in the creation of a nuisance. One has only to think of the effect of thus reducing the width of such a road to about 16 ft when two other large lorries or similar vehicles happen to be overtaking each other to appreciate why his conclusion cannot stand. The more vehicles that were to adopt the same tactics in these container lorry days, the worse the situation would become. e

The law on this point has not changed merely because nowadays one comes across large numbers of cases in which owners or users of vehicles 'obstruct the highway to a greater degree than is permissible hoping that no one will object', to adopt the phrase of Lord Reid in The Wagon Mound (No 2), Overseas Tankship (UK) Ltd v The Miller f

a *Steamship Co Pty Ltd*¹⁰. It follows that in my judgment the driver's convenience was no justification for the lorry being left in Wolseley Road by the third defendant. It thus constituted an actionable nuisance at the time when the first defendant drove into it.

b But the mere fact that a lorry was a nuisance does not render its driver or owner liable to the plaintiff in damages unless its being in that position was a cause of the accident. Counsel for the plaintiff strove manfully to get us to hold that once nuisance is established the usual rules as to causation do not apply. He urged that there existed some form of strict liability which does not obtain even when a breach of absolute statutory liability has been proved. That, in my judgment, was an untenable proposition.

Reference has already been made to the fact that the learned trial judge stated¹¹:

c 'I am quite satisfied on the evidence that this accident happened for one reason only, namely that the [first defendant] simply was not looking where he was going.'

d Moreover, towards the end of his judgment, when discussing what would be the position if he was wrong in holding that the lorry did not constitute a nuisance, he said¹²:

e 'It may in the end be a matter of causation, a matter simply of saying that even if this was a common law obstruction, nevertheless as such it was not causative of the present accident. The accident was, as I said in the first part of this judgment, wholly attributable to the fact that the [first defendant] as he rode along was watching the attractive young ladies on the pavement instead of looking ahead of him to see what conditions he was about to encounter.'

f That is in effect a finding that the sole cause of the accident was the first defendant's negligence. On the facts, that was in my judgment a correct conclusion. It entails a parallel conclusion that the nuisance was not a cause of the plaintiff's injuries; that, indeed, in the vast majority of cases is an inevitable conclusion once negligence on the part of the driver of a stationary vehicle is negatived, for only rarely will that which was found not to be a foreseeable cause of an accident also be found to have been in law the actual cause of it. For that reason, I would dismiss this appeal.

g It is thus not necessary to decide a further point inherent in much that was canvassed before us as to the ingredients of nuisance of the category under consideration. What would be the position if, even though the third defendant had not been negligent in leaving the lorry as it was in fact left, yet there had occurred some unexpected supervening happening—such as an onset of heavy weather, sea mist or fog, or, for instance, a sudden rear light failure (potent cause of fatalities)—which had so affected the situation that the lorry became the cause of an accident? Should the risk fall entirely on those using the highway properly? Or should some liability attach to the person at fault in creating a nuisance? It may well be that, as I am inclined to think, h he who created the nuisance would be under a liability—despite certain views expressed in *Parish v Judd*¹³ (a temporary emergency stop case—correctly decided as such), which I understand are about to be repeated by Edmund Davies LJ and with which, as at present advised, I am unable to concur. If he was thus liable this might be the only class of case in which an action in nuisance by obstruction of the highway could succeed where one in negligence would fail. That, however, on the facts j touching causation found by the learned trial judge remains an issue which can be decided on some other occasion.

EDMUND DAVIES LJ. I agree in the dismissal of this appeal but desire to add some observations of my own. I think I should first say something about my extempore (and unrevised) judgment in *Parish v Judd*¹⁴ which has been referred to in the course of argument. The facts there dealt with were substantially different from those of the present case. There the lorry and towed car which obstructed the highway had come to rest only a few moments before the car carrying the plaintiff crashed into them. In no sense had they been 'parked' on the carriageway as that term is generally understood and as happened in the present case. Again, the lorry and the car were stopped not simply as the result of an act of pure volition and choice on the lorry driver's part, but in an emergency and solely in order that he could ensure that all was well with the towed car and its driver. It was against the background of those facts that the court was called on to adjudicate on the alleged liability of the driver of the stationary car into which that carrying the plaintiff crashed, notwithstanding that the former vehicle was clearly visible 100 yards away. In saying¹⁵ that 'The mere fact that an unlighted vehicle is found at night on a road is not, in my judgment, sufficient to constitute a nuisance', I hope and believe it is clear from the immediately ensuing passages in the judgment that what I there had in mind was that, although the vehicle was so 'found', its driver might nevertheless be exculpated if, for example, it emerged, that it was only momentarily stationary and that without fault on his part. This emerges from the citation made from *Maitland v Raisbeck*¹⁶. It seems clear from that and other cases that it is the leaving of vehicles on the highway which constitutes the first of the two types of public nuisance dealt with by Sir Raymond Evershed MR in *Trevett v Lee*¹⁷. Thus, the examples of obstructions of the highway which amount to nuisance given in Salmond on Torts¹⁸ include 'leaving horses and carts, or motor-vehicles, standing in it for an unreasonable time or in unreasonable number', several reported cases being cited in support of the examples given. In *Maitland v Raisbeck*¹⁹ Lord Greene MR said:

'Every person . . . has a right to use the highway and, if something happens to him which in fact causes an obstruction to the highway but is in no way referable to his fault, it is quite impossible, in my view, to say that ipso facto and immediately a nuisance is created. It would be obviously created if he allows it to be an obstruction for an unreasonable time or in unreasonable circumstances, but the mere fact that it had become an obstruction cannot turn it into a nuisance . . . If that were not so, it seems to me that every driver of a vehicle on the road would be turned into an insurer in respect of latent defects in his own machine.'

Where a vehicle has been left parked on the highway for such a length of time or in such other circumstances as constitute it an obstruction amounting to a public nuisance, I remain of the view I expressed in *Parish v Judd*¹ that, in order that a plaintiff who in such proceedings as the present may recover compensation for personal injuries caused by a collision with that obstruction, he must establish that the obstruction constituted a danger. Nothing to the contrary was said by Devlin J in *Farrell v John Mowlem & Co Ltd*², which was strongly relied on by counsel for the plaintiff. What the learned judge there said of the pipe which the defendants had laid across the pavement was³:

a 'No doubt it is a comparatively harmless sort of nuisance in that most members of the public may be expected to see the pipe, and it will not cause them any grave inconvenience, but that does not prevent it being a nuisance in law,'

all of which connotes that the pipe nevertheless in fact constituted a danger to those less vigilant passers-by who are commonly to be found. Counsel for the plaintiff understandably stresses the further passage in which Devlin J observed⁴:

b '... it is no answer to say, "I laid the pipe across the pavement, but I did it quite carefully and I did not foresee and perhaps a reasonable man would not have foreseen that anybody would be likely to trip over it." He has created a nuisance, and consequently he is liable for what follows.'

c In The Wagon Mound (No 2), *Overseas Tankship (UK) Ltd v The Miller Steamship Co Pty Ltd*⁵, Lord Reid said of this decision:

'The only case cited where there is an express statement that liability does not depend on foreseeability is *Farrell v John Mowlem & Co Ltd*⁶ [and, regarding the passage just cited, Lord Reid added laconically:] He [the learned judge] cites no authority.'

d In *Morton v Wheeler*⁷ Denning LJ drew the same distinction between obstructions of and dangers on the highway as that referred to by Sir Raymond Evershed MR in *Trevett v Lee*⁸. But it is by no means always possible to allocate the facts of a particular case to only one or other of these two categories. It is notorious that what obstructs a highway may also create great danger to those who travel along it, while, on the other hand, danger unaccompanied by obstruction or obstruction giving rise to no danger may occur. In the present case counsel for the plaintiff, not surprisingly, contended that the second defendant's parked lorry did in fact constitute a danger. Denning LJ in *Morton v Wheeler*⁷ asked:

f 'But how are we to determine whether a state of affairs in or near a highway is a danger? [and answered] This depends, I think, on whether injury may reasonably be foreseen. If you take all the cases in the books, you will find that if the state of affairs is such that injury may reasonably be anticipated by persons using the highway, it is a public nuisance... but if the possibility of injury is so remote that he [the reasonable man] would dismiss it out of hand, saying "Of course, it is possible, but not in the least probable", then it is not a danger.'

g It goes without saying, however, that the person creating a highway obstruction must be alert to such sudden and unpredicted weather changes as those to which we are subject in this country at most seasons, to the possibility that the vehicular or highway lighting may fail or be interfered with in these days of rampant vandalism, and to other circumstances which may convert what was originally a danger-free obstruction into a grave traffic hazard. If he fails to exercise ordinary intelligence h in those and similar respects, he can make no proper claim reasonably to have anticipated the probable shape of things to come, and he must expect his conduct to be subjected to the most critical scrutiny in the event of an accident occurring.

Claims in nuisance for personal injuries sustained by colliding with vehicles obstructing highways do not affect the general rule that negligence is not a necessary element in nuisance. The tortious route which has led to an action for nuisance j being available in respect of personal injuries was admirably explored by Professor

Newark in his article 'The Boundaries of Nuisance'⁹. What he there calls the 'simple' principle, that negligence is not an element in the tort of nuisance, is well illustrated by the many reported cases of unlawful interference with a man's enjoyment of his land, it being no defence to say that no such interference was intended and even that all proper care was taken to avoid it. But in my judgment a different approach is called for where damages are sought to be recovered in respect of personal injuries said to have been caused by nuisance arising from the inexcusable presence of vehicles on highways. If deliberately created and clearly giving rise to danger to road users, fault is implicit and liability incontestable. But if an obstruction be created, here too, in my judgment, fault is essential to liability in the sense that it must appear that a reasonable man would be bound to realise the likelihood of risk to highway users resulting from the presence of the obstructing vehicle on the road. In this context it is interesting to recall the words used by Fitzherbert J in 1535 in the case¹⁰ which, in the words of Professor Newark, 'set the law of nuisance on the wrong track'. By way of illustrating that a man who has suffered special injury from a public nuisance may recover compensation therefor, Fitzherbert J said¹⁰:

'As if a man make a trench across the highway, and I come riding that way by night, and I and my horse together fall in the trench so that I have great damage and inconvenience in that, I shall have an action against him who made the trench across the road because I am more damaged than any other man.'

The nature of this illustration is itself significant. The trench being dug 'across' the highway, and the horseman 'riding that way by night' are the typical ingredients of a situation where any reasonable person must have realised that a danger to highway users was being created. That, as I see it, remains today an essential ingredient in cases for personal injuries brought in circumstances such as those existing in the present case. It is true that in the result, as Denning LJ said in *Morton v Wheeler*¹¹,

'Inasmuch as the test of danger is what may reasonably be foreseen, it is apparent that cases of public nuisance . . . have an affinity with negligence.'

Nevertheless, as he went on to point out:

'There is a real distinction between negligence and nuisance. In an action for private damage arising out of a public nuisance, the court does not look at the conduct of the defendant and ask whether he was negligent. It looks at the actual state of affairs as it exists in or adjoining the highway, without regard to the merits or demerits of the defendant. If the state of affairs is such as to be a danger to persons using the highway . . . it is a public nuisance. Once it is held to be a danger, the person who created it is liable unless he can show sufficient justification or excuse.'

Did this particular lorry, parked as it was in all the circumstances described by Sachs LJ, constitute a danger at any time? I deliberately restrict my question in that way, since I am far from desiring to give the slightest encouragement to the unnecessary and avoidable parking of vehicles for lengthy periods, especially on highways designed as Wolseley Road was, for (as the trial judge said) 'a substantial volume of traffic'. But, having so limited it, I have come to the clear conclusion that, although it constituted an obstruction, and, therefore, a public nuisance (having been deliberately and inexcusably left parked for several hours), it did not present a danger to those using the highway in the manner in which they could reasonably have been expected to use it.

a This question of danger is, of course, inextricably linked up with that of causation. Counsel for the plaintiff boldly submitted that, once it be found that this lorry so obstructed the highway as to amount to a nuisance, this created a situation of strict liability, with the result that the matter of causation is immaterial and the plaintiff must necessarily succeed. He was, therefore, driven to assert that, supposing in the present case the motor cyclist had for some reason lost control of his vehicle
b some distance back and thereafter in the course of its unchecked progress it happened to strike the parked lorry (when it might equally well have crashed into a house adjoining the highway), the lorry driver would be liable in nuisance for any personal injuries resulting from the collision. Counsel for the plaintiff appeared hesitant even as to whether there can be room for a finding of contributory negligence in such cases as the present, and this despite *Farrell v John Mowlem & Co Ltd*¹² itself, where
c Devlin J dealt with the components of such a defence to a claim based on highway nuisance. But he was unable to explain why, if he is right, his submissions should not apply equally to other cases of strict liability, such as those arising under *Rylands v Fletcher*¹³ and the Factories Act 1961. With all respect to learned counsel, I feel I need say no more by way of rejecting his submission that causation is here irrelevant than Sachs LJ has already said. To accede to it would have led to the creation of a new sort of tort, a legal freak. For my part, I am not prepared to act as its midwife.
d Granted that a highway be obstructed, it is still for the party suing to show that the existence of the obstruction played some part in bringing about the collision. For this purpose it is not enough to say baldly, as counsel for the plaintiff has done: 'There would have been no collision in the Wolseley Road that night had there been no parked lorry to collide with'. To submit that is to adduce in the most blatant form causa sine qua non, as an all-sufficient basis for a finding of liability.

e The learned judge held¹⁴, on ample evidence, that the lorry—

'was not causative of the present accident. The accident was... wholly attributable to the fact that the [first defendant] as he rode along was watching the attractive young ladies on the pavement instead of looking ahead of him to see what conditions he was about to encounter.'

f That was a conclusion to which he was fully entitled to come, and it was, of itself and regardless of all other points canvassed, fatal to the plaintiff's case. Accordingly, despite the attractively presented and valiant attempt of counsel for the plaintiff to persuade us to the contrary, I would concur in dismissing this appeal.

g STEPHENSON LJ. I agree that this appeal must be dismissed. In a clear and careful judgment the learned judge found that the accident which occurred to the plaintiff was wholly attributable to the negligence of the first defendant. How then can this plaintiff's appeal succeed? Only, in my judgment, by our holding that the third defendant created a nuisance by parking the second defendant's lorry on this road and that the happening of the collision between the lorry and the first defendant's motor cycle thereby entitles the plaintiff to recover from these defendants at least some damages for the injuries which he suffered as a result of that collision. For I agree with the learned judge, for the reasons that he gave and those given by Sachs LJ, that the plaintiff wholly fails to establish any negligence on the part of the third defendant in the manner in which the lorry was parked or in failing to foresee the form of folly which the first defendant's driving of his motor cycle took.

j On nuisance, I am, like Sachs LJ, unwilling to go as far as the learned judge in holding that the parking of this lorry, although careful and reasonable from the third defendant's point of view, was in the light of the realities of life today, as the learned judge puts it, inoffensive from the public point of view and could not possibly have inconvenienced or endangered anybody who looked where he was going. Although the risk of danger was not such as to make the third defendant negligent in parking it when and where and as he did, there might have been a worsening of traffic conditions of the kind indicated by Sachs LJ; and even if the risk of such worsening was remote, the parking of a lorry 7½ ft wide on a main highway for something like nine hours seems to me to constitute an unauthorised obstruction which in the present state of the authorities was prima facie a nuisance actionable at the suit of a person injured by it (whether foreseeably dangerous or not at the time when it was created), because it was not justified by any right to park it there in the third defendant as a user of the highway or as an occupier of adjoining premises or in any other capacity. I agree with Sachs LJ that there may still be rare cases when an injured plaintiff's claim in nuisance may succeed although his claim in negligence fails. However, I agree also that we do not have to decide that question, because I agree with the learned judge that even if the parking was tortious it was not causative of the plaintiff's accident. Counsel for the plaintiff boldly contended that that does not matter, and that once a public nuisance on a highway was created, the creator was in the uniquely unfortunate position of being unable to say that a collision with the obstruction constituting the nuisance was wholly the fault of another, such as the first defendant who drove the plaintiff into it. He conceded that, although worse off in this respect than defendants labouring under any other form of strict liability, such as an absolute statutory duty, the creators of such a nuisance were like other defendants able to avail themselves of a plea of contributory negligence. But, for some reason which even he did not make clear to me, or support by any authority, they could not, he submitted, escape liability altogether by proving the person who collided with the obstruction 99 per cent or 100 per cent to blame.

Like Sachs and Edmund Davies LJJ, I reject the attempt to confer this privilege on those who collide with an unauthorised obstruction in the highway, and I agree that the learned judge was right in dismissing the plaintiff's claim in nuisance against the second and third defendants and in finding that the first defendant was wholly to blame for the accident.

- b Agriculture – Agricultural holding – Notice to quit – Desirable in the interests of sound management of the estate – Meaning of ‘sound management’ – Personal financial interest of landlord not a matter of sound management – Purpose for terminating tenancy must be connected with way estate managed – Landlords giving notice to quit to enable them to re-negotiate letting on terms excluding their existing obligation to supply tenant with cheap electricity – Purpose of termination not desirable in interests of sound management – Consent to operation of notice to quit refused – Agricultural Holdings Act 1948, s 25 (1) (b).

Under a clause in a tenancy agreement made in 1946, relating to a farm, the landlords were obliged to supply the tenant with electricity at a cheap rate. The clause did not restrict the quantity of electricity the tenant could use. In 1970 the landlords paid the electricity board some £88 in respect of mains electricity supplied by the board to the tenant, but could recoup from the tenant, because of the clause in the agreement, only £36. As electricity became more widely used on farms, the tenant's consumption of it was likely to double or treble. The landlords gave the tenant notice to quit the farm for the purpose of renegotiating a letting on terms more favourable to the landlords, i.e. terms which would exclude the obligation to supply cheap electricity. The tenant served a counter-notice; but the Agricultural Land Tribunal consented to the operation of the notice to quit, holding that the purpose for which the landlords proposed to terminate the tenancy was desirable in the interests of sound management of the estate, i.e. the farm, within s 25 (1) (b)^a of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948. The tenant appealed.

Held – Consent to the operation of the notice to quit would be refused, and the appeal allowed, because the reference to ‘sound management’ in s 25 (1) (b) referred to the landlord's obligation to manage the estate properly. A purpose for terminating a tenancy was not ‘desirable in the interests of sound management’ within s 25 (1) (b), unless the purpose was connected with the way in which the land was managed, and the personal financial interest of the landlord, in isolation, was not a matter of ‘sound management’. Accordingly, whether a particular purpose was in the interests of sound management depended on the effect it would have on the management of the estate. In the present case the purpose for which the landlords sought to terminate the tenancy would have no effect on the management of the farm, but merely concerned the landlords' pocket, and so was not a purpose within the contemplation of s 25 (1) (b) (see p 1157 e to h and p 1158 a d and h, post).

Agriculture (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act 1954 by the Agricultural Land Tribunal, Yorkshire and Lancashire Area. a

By a tenancy agreement dated 26th November 1946 Manchester Collieries Ltd (the predecessors in title of the National Coal Board ('the landlords')) let Higher Barns Farm, Astley, in the county of Lancaster to the tenant, Joseph Smith Naylor. Clause 13 of the agreement provided:

'It is hereby agreed and declared that during the continuance of the above mentioned tenancy the Landlords will supply electricity for use on the farm in the farm house and buildings and the tenant shall pay a fixed minimum charge of £4 (Four pounds) a year with an additional charge of 3d per unit consumed as registered on the meter provided for all current consumed at the farm house and farm buildings; it is further agreed between the parties that in connection with the above supply of electricity the Tenant shall claim no compensation from the Landlords for anything upon or done to the property of the Landlords during the continuance of on or after the expiration of this Agreement and that the Landlords shall not be liable in any way for failure to supply in the event of a breakdown or other unforeseen circumstances.'

The landlords served on the tenant notice to quit the holding dated 16th November 1970 which was to have effect on 2nd February 1972 and the tenant served on the landlords a counter-notice dated 9th December 1970 requiring that s 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948, as amended, should apply to the notice to quit. Accompanying the notice to quit was a letter from the landlords offering the tenant a new tenancy of the holding to commence with the expiration of the notice to quit, at a rent failing agreement to be settled by arbitration, the clause relating to the supply of electricity to be excluded, all other terms to be as in the current tenancy. The landlords applied to the tribunal for its consent to the operation of the notice to quit. d

The tribunal found that from the date of the agreement to 1958 the landlords and their predecessors supplied electricity under cl 13 at 110 volts from supplies generated by themselves at a nearby colliery, Nook Colliery, that in 1958 the landlords ceased to generate electricity at Nook Colliery whereupon electricity supplied by the North Western Electricity Board was provided to Nook Colliery via a 2,000 yard supply line from their Astley Green Colliery and thence to the tenant's farm, that in 1961 the farmhouse, farm buildings and the tenant's electrical apparatus were rewired and converted where necessary to use electricity at 230 volts and that from 1961 onwards the landlords had supplied electricity to the tenant at 230 volts. In 1969 the landlords decided to close Nook Colliery and Astley Green Colliery whereby no supply of electricity would be available to the farm from Nook Colliery; the landlords therefore caused the North Western Electricity Board to provide a direct supply of electricity to the farm and, since November 1969, the landlords had paid the North Western Electricity Board for electricity used at the farm and the tenant had paid the landlords for such electricity at the rate provided by cl 13 of the agreement. The tribunal found that in the year ending November 1970 the landlords paid to the North Western Electricity Board for the electricity consumed at the farm a total of £88 15s 1d for which they were able to charge the tenant £36 4s 10d under cl 13; the tribunal also found that by reason of their system of accounting the landlords had incurred work and (unquantified) extra expense in making payments quarterly to the North Western Electricity Board and recovering payments quarterly from the tenant which they would not have incurred if the tenant had paid the North Western Electricity Board for current used at the farm. The tribunal also accepted the landlords' contention that limitations on the possible consumption of electricity by the tenant from the 110 volts private supply available at the time of the original agreement did not apply to 230 volts mains electricity now installed and that the landlords should have some control over the extent of any obligation to provide the tenant e a with a commodity which in modern farming was subject to considerable variations in cost according to the nature and intensity of its use. The landlords gave an undertaking to relet the farm to the tenant on the same terms as theretofore, with the omission of cl 13, at a rent to be agreed or in default of agreement to be settled by arbitration.

b It was contended on behalf of the landlords that sound management of the estate which the tenancy constituted made it essential that the landlords should obtain possession of the land so that they could negotiate with the tenant or with any willing tenant a new tenancy at a fair rent with the obligation to supply electricity eliminated from the tenancy agreement.

c It was contended on behalf of the tenant that it did not amount to sound management for the landlords to use the jurisdiction of the tribunal to breach a pre-existing contract and that their proper procedure was to deal with the matter by means of seeking arbitration as to the proper rent to be paid in the existing conditions and also that there would be no significant difference between the existing regime and the new regime proposed by the landlords.

d The tribunal reached the conclusion that sound estate management necessitated the landlords obtaining possession of the land in order to put the management of the estate on a proper basis and accordingly the tribunal was satisfied that the carrying out of the purpose for which the landlords proposed to terminate the tenancy was desirable in the interests of sound management of the estate to which the notice related. The tribunal was also satisfied that a fair and reasonable landlord would insist on possession. The questions of law which the tribunal referred to the court were as follows: (i) whether the desire of a landlord of an agricultural holding to be relieved of a financially onerous obligation in the tenancy agreement constituted sound management of the estate when the remedy of demanding a reference to arbitration under s 8 of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948 as to the rent payable was available to the landlord; (ii) whether the avoidance of extra work and unquantified expense created by the landlord's system of accountancy could amount to sound management of an estate for the purposes of s 25 (1) (b) of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948, as amended.

LORD WIDGERY CJ. This is an appeal by special case from the Agricultural Land Tribunal for the Yorkshire and Lancashire area in respect of a decision reached by them on 13th May 1971 giving consent to the operation of a notice to quit given by the landlords to the tenant in respect of the holding known as Higher Barns Farm, Astley, in the county of Lancaster. The tenant appeals against the decision of the tribunal, alleging that it was wrong in point of law.

h The facts are these. The tenancy agreement relating to the farm was made as long ago as 26th November 1946. The tenant in those days was the same tenant as is currently the appellant before us today, Mr Joseph Smith Naylor. The landlords originally were a company called Manchester Collieries Ltd. In due course the reversion passed from Manchester Collieries Ltd to the National Coal Board, who remained the landlords, and are the respondents to the proceedings today.

The tenancy agreement is notable for one reason only, that it contains an unusual provision in cl 13. That provides:

i 'It is hereby agreed and declared that during the continuance of the above mentioned tenancy the Landlords will supply electricity for use on the farm in the farm house and buildings and the tenant shall pay a fixed minimum charge of £4 (Four pounds) a year with an additional charge of 3d per unit consumed as registered on the meter provided for all current consumed at the farm house and farm buildings; it is further agreed between the parties that in connection with the above supply of electricity the Tenant shall claim no compensation from the Landlords for anything upon or done to the property of the Landlords during the continuance of on or after the expiration of this agreement . . .'

That clause was inserted in the agreement by reason of the fact that the landlords were the Manchester colliery, and by reason further of the fact that they owned a colliery called Nook Colliery which was some short distance from the farm buildings on this farm. Evidently it was convenient in 1946 for the landlords to supply electricity to the tenant from their own sources at Nook Colliery where they had their own generating equipment, and indeed this was done by means of the supply of electricity at 110 volts for some time.

After a time, however, Nook Colliery ceased to provide electricity, and the supply then came from another colliery called Astley Green Colliery, but in the fullness of time both these collieries were closed down and the landlords then provided a new supply of electricity to the farm from mains of the North Western Electricity Board. From about 1961 onwards the tenant has been enjoying ordinary mains electricity supply from the electricity board, but he has still paid to the landlords the amount required of him under cl 13, the landlords being responsible for settling the bill with the electricity board. The tribunal found that in 1970 the landlords had paid £88 odd in respect of the supply of this electricity, and had been able to recoup themselves only to the tune of £36. That margin itself might not be a very grave matter, but behind the landlords' concern about the continuance of this arrangement is the fact that as electricity becomes more widely used in farming, the consumption of electricity on this farm might double or treble itself, and there is, of course, no restriction in cl 13 as to the total quantity which is to be used. Accordingly, and not as it seems to me without reason, the landlords were concerned to put an end to this open ended obligation to supply cheap electricity to the tenant.

The only course open to them, as they saw it, was to give the tenant notice to quit with a view to negotiating a new lease, either with this tenant or another, but a new letting which would exclude from its terms the particular clause about the electricity supply to which I referred. Accordingly, notice to quit was duly given; the tenant gave a counter-notice under s 24 of the Agricultural Holdings Act 1948, and that meant that the landlords could not proceed to obtain possession without an order of the Agricultural Land Tribunal.

At this point one must turn to look at the legislation in a little more detail, because s 25 of the Act specifies precisely the circumstances in which the tribunal could, as a matter of law, give effect to the landlords' desire. The section as amended provides:

'(1) The Agricultural Land Tribunal shall consent under the last foregoing section to the operation of a notice to quit an agricultural holding or part of an agricultural holding if, but only if, they are satisfied as to one or more of the following matters, being a matter or matters specified by the landlord in his application for their consent, that is to say—(a) that the carrying out of the purpose for which the landlord proposes to terminate the tenancy is desirable in the interests of good husbandry as respects the land to which the notice relates, treated as a separate unit; or (b) that the carrying out thereof is desirable in the interests of sound management of the estate of which the land to which the notice relates forms part or which that land constitutes; or . . . (d) that greater hardship would be caused by withholding than by giving consent to the operation of the notice . . .'

In this case the landlords sought to proceed before the tribunal under paras (b) and (d) of the section which I have read. They failed under para (d) and no further reference to that paragraph is required, but they succeeded under para (b), and the issue before this court is whether as a matter of law the purpose which the landlord sought to achieve by giving notice to quit was a purpose within the terms of para (b).

a It is helpful, I think, to read para (b) again in the light of those considerations, and to read it as incorporating in it the relevant words in para (a). Thus it reads:

‘that the carrying out of the purpose for which the landlord proposes to terminate the tenancy is desirable in the interests of sound management of the estate of which the land to which the notice relates forms part or which that land constitutes.’

b It is common ground that the estate for present purposes is the farm alone, and it is not one of those cases in which the landlord owns a number of farms in a single unit and lets them to different tenants. Here we are concerned with one farm and one farm only which is the estate for the purpose of para (b). I ask myself: what is the purpose for which the landlords propose to terminate the tenancy, and the answer is very simple. Their purpose is to put themselves in a position in which they can renegotiate a letting of this farm on terms more favourable to themselves than the present; that undoubtedly is the purpose.

c Is the purpose one which could possibly be described as desirable in the interests of sound management of the estate? The argument for the landlords is that sound management includes such matters as seeing that the terms of the tenancy are appropriate, fair and proper, and that a landlord who seeks to eliminate from the tenancy agreement an unusual, burdensome and perhaps unfair clause, can fairly be described as saying that he is seeking to achieve a purpose desirable in the interests of sound management.

d On the other hand it is argued by counsel for the tenant that sound management relates to the management of the land, and that no purpose can be described as being desirable in the interests of sound management unless that purpose is connected with the way in which the land is managed. He says that the personal financial interest of the landlords looked on in isolation is not a matter of sound management of the estate for this purpose, and accordingly he contends that as a matter of construction of the section the purpose here that might be achieved is without the terms of s 25 (1) (b). I have come to the clear conclusion that the tenant’s contention in this case is right. The reference to sound management is a successor of a more familiar phrase ‘good estate management’, but it refers to the obligations of a landlord as one of the partners in a partnership which produces food from the land. The obligation of the tenant is to observe the rules of good husbandry; the obligation of the landlord is to manage the estate properly. In my judgment when we consider whether a particular purpose is in the interests of sound management in that sense, we cannot look simply to the landlord’s pocket, but must ask ourselves what effect the purpose would have on the management of the farm, and if, as in the present case, the answer is that the purpose would have no effect whatever on the management of the farm itself, it seems to me to exclude the purpose from those contemplated by s 25 (1) (b). In my judgment the tribunal erred in law, and I would allow the appeal.

h ASHWORTH J. I agree, and I would only add a few words. In my judgment, when one is considering the conditions set out in s 25 (1), it is convenient to look at them all and read para (d) in its context. I do not propose to read them in full, but para (a) clearly relates to something which I will call physical, namely good husbandry; para (b) as the words ‘sound management of the estate’; para (c) is interesting because it refers to—

i ‘agricultural research, education, experiment or demonstration, or for the purposes of the enactments relating to smallholdings or allotments’, plainly in this context a physical idea. Paragraph (d) it is true deals I think with greater hardship, and that is personal to the parties, but para (e) is not without significance:

'that the landlord proposes to terminate the tenancy for the purpose of the land's being used for a use, other than for agriculture . . .'

It seems to me that looked at in this way, sound management in para (b) is directly in context related to the management of the farm in the physical sense of the word and is something quite distinct from the financial result to the landlord himself.

Apart from that, I derive assistance from s 25 (5) to which counsel for the tenant referred, and that, as amended, provides:

'Where the Agricultural Land Tribunal consent under the last foregoing section to the operation of a notice to quit, the Tribunal may impose such conditions as appear to the Tribunal requisite for securing that the land to which the notice relates will be used for the purpose for which the landlord proposes to terminate the tenancy.'

In other words there is a purpose affecting the user of the land, and that is the purpose for which he proposes to terminate the tenancy.

In this case in my judgment the purpose for which the landlords propose to terminate has nothing to do with the user of the land. It merely concerns the financial result to the landlords. I note that at the conclusion of the case stated the tribunal said:

'[They] reached the conclusion that sound estate management necessitated the Landlords obtaining possession of the land in order to put the management of the estate on a proper basis . . .'

It seems to me that those words, in the context of the facts proved and the argument, can only mean that the tribunal took the view that a proper basis of sound management involved the removal of an onerous clause. With all respect to the tribunal, I think they misdirected themselves. This estate or land was being managed on a perfectly proper basis before even the notice to quit was given; all that was causing difficulty, so to speak, in the management at that time was the inclusion of an expensive clause regarding electricity. In that sense, too, I think the tribunal misdirected themselves. One possibility which might occur if counsel for the landlords is right would be that a landlord could say: I wish to sell this land with vacant possession because in the sound management of my estate I shall do more by getting the capital out of it. It seems to me that those approaches to the problem, namely those involving the landlord's financial position rather than the actual management of the farm, are not in accord with the intention of the section. For those reasons, in addition to those given by Lord Widgery CJ, I would allow this appeal.

GRIFFITHS J. I also agree.

Decision of the tribunal set aside. Order that consent to the operation of the notice to quit be refused. Leave to appeal granted.

3rd DECEMBER 1971

Income tax – Emoluments of office or employment – Place of performance of duties – Duties treated as performed in United Kingdom – Duties of office or employment under the Crown of a public nature – Emoluments payable out of public revenue – Taxpayer permanent civil servant employed outside United Kingdom – Taxpayer without professional or technical qualifications – Implementing instructions handed down by superior officers – Subordinate position with limited duties – Whether employment ‘of a public nature’ – Finance Act 1956, Sch 2, para 6.

The taxpayer was at all material times employed as a permanent established civil servant of the industrial class, although he held a post in the technical class on a temporary basis. His duties were connected with Naval, Royal Air Force and Military establishments outside the United Kingdom and entailed the supervision of mechanical and engineering operations carried out by workmen in the industrial grades. These operations included work on air conditioning plant, airfield amenities for the Royal Air Force and the maintenance of electrical installations in service quarters and working areas. The taxpayer was responsible to professional engineers or superior officers in the technical class for the work carried out under his supervision. The Finance Act 1956, Sch 2, para 6^a, provided that for the purposes of Cases I and II of Sch E, the duties of any office or employment under the Crown ‘which [was] of a public nature’ and of which the emoluments were payable out of the public revenue of the United Kingdom were to be treated as performed in the United Kingdom. The taxpayer contended that because he had no professional or technical qualifications, had no power to make decisions on matters of policy or otherwise, but merely implemented instructions handed down to him by superior officers in the executive and higher technical grades, his duties were not of a public nature within para 6 which, he argued, were limited to those of Ministers, Permanent Secretaries or Directors of Ministries. It was not disputed that the taxpayer held an office or employment under the Crown or that his emoluments were paid out of the public revenue.

Held – The taxpayer’s employment was of a public nature because, whilst the statutory language contemplated that there might be offices or employment under the Crown, with emoluments payable out of the public revenue, which were not of a public nature (e.g. that of an ambassador’s valet), it was not arguable that the taxpayer’s employment was of a private nature or was one in which there was no public interest in the sense of a legitimate concern; the taxpayer’s duties were plainly of importance to the efficiency of an important branch of the public service and it made no difference that the taxpayer was in a subordinate position with very limited duties; the duties of a civil servant did not suddenly become of a ‘public nature’ on promotion but were prima facie of a public nature whatever the rank or grade of the servant (see p 1165 c to e, post).

At a meeting of the Commissioners for the General Purposes of the Income Tax Acts held on 20th January 1971 William James Graham ('the taxpayer') appealed against assessments to income tax made on him under Sch E for the years and in the amounts following:

Year	Made	Amount
1959-60	23 10 61	969
1961-62	29 6 63	1,304
1962-63	29 6 63	1,239
1963-64	8 3 65	1,783
1964-65	6 4 70	2,406
1965-66	6 4 70	2,100
1966-67	9 6 69	1,653
1967-68	9 6 69	2,230
1968-69	9 6 69	1,919

Notice of appeal against the above assessments was submitted by the taxpayer outside the statutory period for appealing except in relation to the assessments for the years 1964-65 and 1965-66. The taxpayer had applied for an appeal for each of the years of assessment specified above to be admitted for consideration but the respondent inspector of taxes, David Sibbald White, pursuant to the powers in that behalf contained in s 49 (1) of the Taxes Management Act 1970, had indicated to the taxpayer that he was prepared to admit late appeals for the years of assessment 1966-67, 1967-68 and 1968-69 only and that he was unwilling to do so in respect of the years of assessment 1959-60, 1961-62, 1962-63 or 1963-64 without reference to the commissioners. After hearing the taxpayer and the inspector of taxes the commissioners decided that the appeals by the taxpayer in respect of all the years of assessment listed above which were made out of time, be admitted as late appeals and considered with the appeals against the other two assessments under appeal.

a The taxpayer did not dispute the amount of the assessment on him for any of the years under appeal and the only question at issue before the commissioners was whether or not the taxpayer was in each of the years under appeal performing the duties of an office or employment under the Crown which was of a public nature within the meaning of para 6 of Sch 2 to the Finance Act 1956 (now s 184 (3) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1970).

b The following facts were agreed or proved. (1) Throughout the years of assessment under appeal the taxpayer was a permanent civil servant holding an established post and the certificate of the Civil Service Commissioners. (2) The taxpayer's established grade was in the industrial class but that, throughout the years under appeal, he was holding, on a temporary basis, a post in the technical class and was being paid the higher rate of salary attaching to that class. (3) The taxpayer, although still holding the temporary grading within the technical class, was liable at the discretion of the employing department to be returned to his established grading within the industrial class; this had not in fact happened to the taxpayer and on a date after 5th April 1969 his membership of the technical class was placed on a permanent basis. (4) During the years of assessment under appeal, the taxpayer was employed successively by the Air Ministry and the Ministry of Public Building and Works and he was performing his duties outside the United Kingdom throughout those years. (5) The taxpayer's duties were wholly connected with Naval, Royal Air Force and Military establishments of the Crown. Such duties were at all times performed within the confines of those establishments and entailed the supervision of mechanical and engineering operations carried out by workmen in the industrial grades. The operations included work on air conditioning plants, airfield amenities for the Royal Air Force and the maintenance of electrical installations in service quarters and working areas. The taxpayer was responsible to professional engineers or superior officers in the technical class for the work carried out under his supervision. (6) At all material times the emoluments received by the taxpayer were payable out of the public revenue of the United Kingdom.

f It was contended on behalf of the taxpayer that during the years of assessment under appeal he was not liable to pay income tax by virtue of the provisions of para 6 (a) of Sch 2 to the Finance Act 1956 for the reason that his duties in the course of his employment were not 'of a public nature'. The taxpayer was, at the material time, an established civil servant in the industrial class, and although he was in fact holding the temporary status of the technical class whilst abroad during the years under appeal and thus received the higher salary which such status attracted, he contended that he had no right to expect that he would remain in that class and was liable to be required to revert to his lower status in the industrial class at any time. Notwithstanding this, it was argued on behalf of the taxpayer that his work could be carried out, and his position held, by a person having no professional or technical qualifications whatever. He was thus in a subordinate position with very limited duties; he had no power to make decisions on matters of policy or otherwise but merely implemented instructions handed down to him by superior officers in the executive and higher technical grades and saw to it that work was carried out in accordance with the drawings and specifications by workers in the industrial class. The taxpayer submitted that the expression 'of a public nature' for the purposes of para 6 (a) of Sch 2 to the 1956 Act could only relate to a person holding a position of authority within a public body, namely, one having overall control and responsibility for the efficiency and profitability of such public body and invested with complete managerial status. In the context of the civil service, to bring duties within the category 'of a public nature', the holder of a post should be either Ministers in charge of Ministries, Permanent Secretaries or Directors of Ministries, i.e. that is to say persons of director status and above. Civil servants in the lower grades, which included the taxpayer's own established post in the industrial class and also his temporary grading within the technical class, lacked both the status and responsibility needed to bring the duties of office within the above-mentioned category 'of a public nature'.

It was contended on behalf of the inspector of taxes: (1) that the question whether the taxpayer's office or employment under the Crown was 'of a public nature' within the meaning of para 6 of Sch 2 to the Finance Act 1956 in each of the years in question depended on the nature of the office or employment and its duties; (2) that the taxpayer's office or employment under the Crown and its duties were concerned exclusively with bases and establishments of the armed forces; (3) that the taxpayer's office or employment under the Crown was therefore for each of the years in question 'of a public nature' within the meaning of para 6.

The commissioners who heard the appeal held that at all material times the taxpayer, as an established civil servant, was performing duties of an office or employment under the Crown which was 'of a public nature' within the meaning of para 6 (a) of Sch 2 to the Finance Act 1956. They therefore dismissed the appeal and confirmed the assessments.

The taxpayer appealed by way of case stated to the High Court.

P W Medd for the Crown.

MEGARRY J. This is a case stated by the General Commissioners for the Abingdon Division of Berkshire. It concerns Sch E tax for the years 1959-60 to 1968-69 inclusive. The amounts range from just under £1,000 to rather under £2,500 for the various years in question. The taxpayer appealed against these assessments and the commissioners dismissed his appeal. The taxpayer was at all material times employed as a permanent established civil servant of the industrial class, although he held a post in the technical class on a temporary basis. He was first in the Air Ministry and later in the Ministry of Public Building and Works. His duties were performed outside the United Kingdom.

The question before me turns on the language of the Finance Act 1956, Sch 2, para 6. This, in dealing with Sch E, provides that:

'For the purposes of Cases I and II (including the purposes of this Schedule so far as it relates to those Cases), the following duties shall be treated as performed in the United Kingdom, namely—(a) the duties of any office or employment under the Crown which is of a public nature and of which the emoluments are payable out of the public revenue of the United Kingdom or of Northern Ireland...'

The argument has centred round the words 'which is of a public nature'. It has not been suggested that the words 'any office or employment under the Crown' were not satisfied; nor has there been any contention about the emoluments, which are admittedly within the phrase 'payable out of the public revenue of the United Kingdom or of Northern Ireland'. The sole question arises on the qualifying words that I have mentioned. The taxpayer contends that they do not apply, and the Crown that they do apply. The commissioners accepted the contention of the Crown and dismissed the taxpayer's appeal.

The case stated says of the taxpayer's duties that they were—

'wholly connected with Naval, Royal Air Force and Military establishments of the Crown. Such duties were at all times performed within the confines of the said establishments and entailed the supervision of mechanical and engineering operations carried out by workmen in the Industrial Grades. The operations included work on air conditioning plants, airfield amenities for the Royal Air Force and the maintenance of electrical installations in Service quarters and working areas. The [taxpayer] was responsible to professional engineers or superior officers in the Technical Class for the work carried out under his supervision.'

The main contention of the taxpayer has been that although in fact the work he a carried out was at all times work within the technical class, he had no right to expect to remain in that technical class; he had no professional or technical qualifications whatsoever, and he was in a subordinate position with very limited duties. He had no power to make decisions on matters of policy or otherwise, but merely implemented instructions handed down to him by superior officers in the executive and higher technical grades, and saw to it that that work was carried out in accordance with the drawings and specifications by workers in the industrial class. On that foundation the taxpayer rested a contention that the expression 'of a public nature' b within the statute could relate only to a person holding a position of authority within a public body. The argument went to the extent of saying that in order to bring duties within the category 'of a public nature' the holders of the post should be—

c 'either Ministers in charge of Ministries, Permanent Secretaries or Directors of Ministries—that is to say persons of Director status and above.'

Those of lower grades lacked both the status and the responsibility needed to bring their duties of office within the phrase.

Now it is plain that there are three constituent elements in the statutory language. First, there is 'office or employment under the Crown', an expression which is admittedly satisfied; secondly, there are the words in dispute, 'which is of a public nature'; d and thirdly, there is the concluding phrase relating to the source of the emoluments, and that again is not in dispute. With the statute expressed in that language, it cannot have been contemplated that the disputed phrase should be defined in terms of who the employer is or whence the emoluments came, for these elements are explicitly provided for in the first and the third limbs. Further, the contemplation e of the language appears to be that there may be offices or employments under the Crown, with emoluments payable out of the public revenue, which are not within the statutory expression because they are not 'of a public nature': otherwise those words would be pleonastic. Counsel for the Crown was hard put to it to find any substantial body of examples of such a category, although he did contribute the suggestion of an ambassador's valet. His contention was that apart from excep- f tions of this kind, every civil servant, however exalted or however humble, would normally satisfy the statutory requirement. He understandably found difficulty in framing any test, but contended that an office or employment was 'of a public nature' if the public was interested in the discharge of the duties of that office or employment. In that proposition, derived from some words of Lawrence J used in a quite different context in *R v Whitaker*¹, the word 'interested' must be used in the g sense of legitimate concern rather than of the mere gratification of curiosity.

No authority is directly in point, for the language used by Parliament in successive fiscal Acts has changed. In *Bowers v Harding*², concerning the Income Tax Act 1853, ss 2 and 51, where the phrases were 'every public office or employment of profit' and 'any public office or employment', Pollock B said³ that a schoolmaster and school- mistress, married to each other, held such an office because, inter alia, they held it h 'in order that they may discharge a duty which is recognised as a part of the public service of the country'. In *Inland Revenue Comrs v Hambrook*⁴, which was concerned not with tax but with whether a government department could recover damages per quod servitium amisit in respect of an established civil servant in that department who had been incapacitated from duty by the defendant in a road accident, Lord Goddard CJ said⁵:

j 'An established civil servant, whatever his grade, is more properly described as an officer in the civil employment of Her Majesty and I can see no ground on which different rules of law in respect of his employment can be applied according to the grade or position he may occupy. They apply to a junior clerical officer as they do to a Permanent Secretary, just as the Judicial Committee said in *A-G. for New South Wales v Perpetual Trustee Co. (Ltd.)*⁶, the same rules of law in this respect apply in relation to the armed forces to a field marshal as to a private soldier.' a

In the Court of Appeal, Parker LJ quoted this passage with approval⁷. Lord Goddard CJ⁸ also referred to *R v Dr Burnell*⁹, where it was said that: b

'... every man is a publick officer who hath any duty concerning the publick; and he is not less a publick officer where his authority is confined to narrow limits, because 'tis the duty of his office, and the nature of that duty, which makes him a publick officer, and not the extent of his authority.' c

The case that comes nearest to providing any assistance for the taxpayer is *Great Western Railway Co v Bater*¹⁰. This turned on the Income Tax Act 1842, Sch E, r 3, and the Income Tax Act 1860, s 6. The latter section provided for the deduction of tax by a railway company from all emoluments 'in respect of all offices and employments of profit held in or under any railway company'. Rule 3 of Sch E provided for tax on a long list of named categories of 'public offices and employments of profit', including Parliament, the armed forces and many things besides, and ended with the words 'and every other public office or employment of profit of a public nature'. With Lord Buckmaster dissenting, the House of Lords held that this phrase did not apply to a railway clerk engaged at an annual salary paid by fortnightly instalments, whose employment was determinable by one month's notice and who received payment during sickness and a pension at 60. It will be observed that, unlike the present statute, the Act did not in terms provide for the source of payment, nor did the general words at the end of r 3 expressly stipulate who the employer should be. These matters were left to be deduced from the language used, and in particular from, no doubt, the phrase 'of a public nature'. In consequence, those elements entered into the content of the meaning of the phrase in a way that is hardly possible under the present language. The speeches also reflect the old concept of an office or employment as something capable of being assessed as such, despite changes in the holder of that office or employment, a concept which I now understand to have disappeared from the taxing Acts. d

I do not propose to read the speeches in Bater's case¹⁰. I think that both the language and the context in that case differ materially from those in the case before me. I also have had, despite counsel for the Crown's assistance, considerable difficulty in ascertaining the real ratio decidendi of the case. In response to a question from the Bench, counsel for the Crown was unable to found any real propositions of law on that case. In those circumstances, I take comfort from the words of Viscount Dunedin (albeit uttered in dissent) in *Great Western Railway Co v SS Mostyn (Owners), The Mostyn*¹¹, that if the ratio decidendi of a case is not clear, e

'I do not think it is part of the tribunal's duty to spell out with great difficulty a ratio decidendi in order to be bound by it.' f

I return, then, to the statutory language before me. I have to bear in mind that g a the words are words used in 1956 in a statute which is no mere consolidation Act, but makes new provisions in language which is no mere repetition of previous language. Read in this way, I think the words 'office or employment' must be read in a modern sense, unhampered by the ideas of the 18th and 19th centuries. If a man can fairly be said to be 'employed under the Crown', I do not see why his employment should not be 'employment under the Crown'. At that stage, with the phrase b 'office or employment' not prefaced (unlike earlier statutes) by the word 'public', one simply looks to see whether the taxpayer can fairly be said to have 'employment under the Crown'; and beyond argument the answer here is 'Yes'. The source of the emoluments is also admittedly the appropriate public revenue, and so the one question is whether the employment is 'of a public nature'. I cannot see that it is even arguable that it is of a private nature. Nor could it very well be said that the c employment was one in which there was no public interest, in the sense of a legitimate concern. The duties described in the case stated are plainly of importance to the efficiency of an important branch of the public service. I cannot see that it makes any difference that the taxpayer was, in the words of his argument before the commissioners, 'in a subordinate position with very limited duties', or that he did not occupy a status equivalent to director or above. I do not think that the duties of a d civil servant suddenly become 'of a public nature' on promotion. The nature of the service and its duties seems to me to be at least prima facie public, whatever the rank or grade of the servant. Articles provided 'for the public service' are nonetheless legitimately used (subject always to civil service proprieties) because they are used by one who stands at the bottom of the ladder. Subject to the case of an ambassador's valet and any others whose office or employment has no substantial public content, e I think the language of the Act prima facie applies to all civil servants. However, all I have to decide is whether on the facts as found the taxpayer in this case holds an office or employment within the Finance Act 1956, Sch 2, para 6. In my judgment, he does, and the decision of the commissioners was right. I am conscious that the path of caution might have been to follow the example of Lord Wrenbury in Bater's case¹² and say nothing by way of attempted explanation or definition. However, f as the position of a number of taxpayers may be in doubt, I have attempted to say something that may be of some assistance (although I fear not much) to others faced with this sort of problem.

Let me add this. I think I can understand at least part of the taxpayer's grievance. This is that some unestablished civil servants abroad have apparently not been treated as being within the statutory language, and only recently have suffered something of the nature of a deduction equivalent to the tax not paid by them, the deduction
g being made from certain allowances. I can well perceive that it would be galling to an established civil servant to see his unestablished brother, doing similar work, escape the tax that the established have to pay. However, it is difficult to see why the remedy for the assumed immunity from tax of the unestablished should be to draw a line among the established according to rank or grade, and to say that below
h that line there shall be no liability to tax, and above it there shall be liability; that shifts the contrast without removing it. Nor can I find any warrant in the language of the present statute for any line of the sort drawn in Bater's case¹³. My task is simply to construe the statute, and for the reasons I have given this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

CHANCERY DIVISION

Company – Take-over bid – Duty of directors of offeree company – Duty to be honest and not to mislead shareholders as to acceptability of offer – Remedy for breach of duty – Offer by company for stock of offeree company – Terms negotiated by boards of offeror and offeree companies – Agreement by board of offeree company to recommend acceptance to stockholders – Board of offeree company subsequently obtaining independent advice on offer – Advice that offer should not be recommended to stockholders – Board of offeree company recommending acceptance – Recommendations making brief reference to adverse advice without full particulars – Plaintiffs dissenting stockholders of offeree company – Whether plaintiffs entitled to interlocutory injunctions restraining board of offeree company from recommending acceptance and offeror company from declaring acceptance unconditional.

R Co owned a considerable mileage of canals, mostly derelict, and valuable land in the centre of Manchester. A property development company, T C Ltd, sought to acquire R Co's assets for development purposes. After negotiations the chairman of T C Ltd reached agreement in July 1971 with R Co that on the basis of an offer by T C Ltd of £200 for every £100 of R Co stock, the directors of R Co would recommend acceptance of the offer to the R Co stockholders. A joint announcement was made by the companies on 1st September. Later in September the directors of R Co belatedly called in a firm of stockbrokers, H C & Son, to advise the board of R Co on the merits of the offer. Concurrently the boards of R Co and T C Ltd co-operated in the preparation of a draft joint offer document including a letter from the chairman of R Co recommending the offer to R Co stockholders and stating that the directors had carefully considered the offer in consultation with their financial advisers, H C & Son, and considered the terms fair and reasonable. On 8th October H C & Son advised the board of R Co that the offer was inadequate and that its acceptance should not be recommended to the stockholders. In view of the advice received R Co and T C Ltd were unable to send out their circular letters to stockholders as drafted. Instead T C Ltd sent out their circular on 18th October, making no mention of H C & Son's report, but stating that R Co's directors had irrevocably accepted the offer in respect of their holdings and had undertaken to recommend other stockholders to accept the offer. On 29th October R Co issued a circular letter advising that H C & Son had reached the conclusion that the terms of the offer represented too large a discount on the current value of the company's net assets, that the directors disagreed with that view and continued to recommend all stockholders to accept the offer. The plaintiffs, who were stockholders of R Co who dissented from the offer, sought interlocutory injunctions to restrain the board of R Co from taking further steps to recommend the offer and T C Ltd from declaring or purporting to declare the offer unconditional.

Held – The directors of an offeree company owed a duty to their shareholders which included the duty to be honest and not to mislead; any minority shareholders of such a company could properly complain if they were being wrongfully subjected to the power of compulsory purchase by the offeror company under s 209 of the Companies Act 1948 as a result of a breach of duty on the part of the board of the offeree company. In the absence of bad faith, however, on the part of the boards of R Co and T C Ltd, or of conduct so unreasonable as to approach bad faith, and as the directors of R Co held and could reasonably hold that the offer was advantageous to stockholders, the interlocutory injunctions should not be granted (see p 1170 d and g to j, post).

Motion

- By a writ dated 5th November 1971 the plaintiffs, Edward Gething, Dora Cowcill, Mary Jackson and John Gordon Rigg, who were stockholders of the Rochdale Canal Co ('Rochdale'), claimed against the defendants, Edward Kilner, P E Warrington, J K Mitchell, D E M Hawkins, Town Centre Securities Ltd ('Town Centre') and Rochdale, a declaration that the despatch by Town Centre to the stockholders of Rochdale of a letter of offer dated 18th October 1971 and/or the despatch by the first four defendants ('the Rochdale directors') acting as directors of Rochdale to the stockholders of Rochdale of a circular letter dated 28th October 1971 (i) involved a breach or breaches by the Rochdale directors of the duties owed by them to Rochdale and/or the stockholders of Rochdale, (ii) a breach or breaches by the Rochdale directors and/or by Town Centre of the Prevention of Fraud (Investments) Act 1958, (iii) was effected pursuant to a conspiracy between the Rochdale directors and the directors of Town Centre against Rochdale and/or the stockholders of Rochdale. The plaintiffs also claimed, inter alia: (1) an injunction restraining the Rochdale directors and Rochdale from (i) taking any further step to recommend to any of the stockholders of Rochdale the acceptance of the offer by Town Centre contained in the letter of 18th October 1971 to purchase all of the stock of Rochdale (other than that already owned by Town Centre), and (ii) taking any other step calculated or intended to persuade or cause any of the stockholders to accept the offer; (2) an injunction restraining Town Centre from (i) declaring or purporting to declare the offer unconditional, (ii) taking any steps calculated or intended to persuade or cause any of the stockholders to accept the offer. By notice of motion dated 5th November 1971 the plaintiffs sought interlocutory injunctions in the terms of the injunctions claimed in the writ. The facts are set out in the judgment.

BRIGHTMAN J. This application relates to a take-over bid by Town Centre Securities Ltd (which I shall call 'Town Centre') for the issued stock of Rochdale Canal Co (which I shall call 'Rochdale'). It raises an important and, as far as I am concerned, a novel question, which can be put shortly in this way: whether a shareholder in an offeree company who is dissatisfied with the manner in which an intended take-over is being conducted can, as it were, stop the take-over in mid-stream on the ground, in substance, that other shareholders are being misled into accepting the offer. No reported authorities were cited to me in argument.

The story shortly is this. Since 1964 or thereabouts Town Centre have been availing themselves of opportunities to acquire stock in Rochdale. Rochdale is a canal undertaking which was established some 200 years ago. It owns 35 miles of canal in Yorkshire and Lancashire, mostly derelict, plus six acres of land near the centre of Manchester known as the Dale Street Basin. In 1970 Town Centre bought a substantial holding of stock in Rochdale at 175 per cent and later in that year further stock at a somewhat lower figure. It built up its holding to about 30 per cent of the issued Rochdale stock. The six acre site which I have mentioned was then currently being used and, as far as I am aware, is still being used as a car park; it was gradually being cleared for development.

In 1969 Rochdale, acting, according to the evidence, in conjunction with Town Centre, obtained outline planning permission for a comprehensive redevelopment; the outline planning permission was due to expire in 1972. Clearly it was this site which was the attraction as far as Town Centre was concerned, Town Centre being a property development company. In July 1971 the chairman of Town Centre approached the Rochdale board and intimated that Town Centre would like to make a take-over bid for Rochdale stock at 175 per cent; the Rochdale board were asking 225 per cent. Some bargaining ensued. In the end the chairman of Town Centre agreed to raise the bid to 200 per cent on condition that the Rochdale board would recommend the offer to its shareholders. The Rochdale board agreed to do this; a joint announcement by the two boards to that effect was made on 1st September 1971. a

Towards the end of September a firm called Messrs Henry Cooke & Son, who were stockbrokers of Manchester, were retained, somewhat belatedly, to advise the Rochdale board on the merits of the offer to which, of course, the Rochdale board had already committed themselves in principle. Concurrently the Rochdale and Town Centre boards co-operated in the preparation of the draft offer document. The offer was intended to be dated 5th October and it was intended to consist of two circular letters; a letter over the name of the chairman of Rochdale recommending the offer to the Rochdale stockholders and a letter over the name of the chairman of Town Centre containing the terms of the offer. The letter from the chairman of Rochdale was going to conclude with this paragraph: b

'Your Directors have carefully considered the terms of the Offer in consultation with their financial advisers for the purposes of the Offer, Henry Cooke & Son, members of the Northern Stock Exchange, and consider such terms to be fair and reasonable.' c

The second paragraph of the Town Centre circular was going to contain these words: d

'There is set out on page 2 [that is of the bundle of offer documents] a letter from your Chairman, Mr. J. P. Wilkinson, which forms part of this Offer Letter. As stated therein your Directors recommend you to accept the Offer which they themselves have agreed to accept or have undertaken to obtain acceptance of in respect of holdings amounting in total to approximately 13.2 per cent. of the capital of Rochdale.' e

Unfortunately Messrs Henry Cooke & Son did not think that the proposed offer was good enough. On 6th October they addressed a letter to the Rochdale board: f

'You have asked us to act as your financial advisers for the purposes of the Offer for all the issued consolidated ordinary stock by Town Centre Securities Limited at the price of £200 cash for each £100 nominal of the stock. In reaching our conclusion as to whether we feel the bid can be recommended by you we have taken into account the following: a) Information supplied to our representative at a meeting in your offices with . . . b) A valuation of the quoted investments of [Rochdale] prepared by ourselves on Monday 4th October 1971. c) A valuation of the [Rochdale's] land at Dale Street by Messrs. W. H. Robinson & Co., dated 5th October, 1971. d) An informal valuation of [Rochdale's] other land and building provided to us by Mr. Hawkins. Having given due consideration to the foregoing it is our opinion that the bid from Town Centre Securities Limited of £200 in cash for each £100 of consolidated ordinary stock of your company is inadequate and its acceptance should not be recommended to the Stockholders.' g

The valuation of the land referred to dated 5th October under the heading 'Dale Street Basin' is by Messrs Robinson & Co. The first paragraph reads: 'As requested we have given consideration to the value of this property, the extent of which' is identified on a plan. . . And then, a little later, this paragraph: h

'Outline planning permission was granted on 30th April 1969 under reference TP 55575 for comprehensive development including offices, shops, car parking, hotel/motel, living accommodation, showrooms, pedestrian gardens and lagoon j a for boats. Ten conditions were imposed, in particular restricting the overall plot ratio to 2 and the shopping content to a maximum 15,000 ft. It is to be noted that any application for approval of reserved matters must be made within three years of the date of the outline permission i.e. only a short time is available for working up the details of any scheme within the context of the present approval.'

b And the final two paragraphs:

c 'It is in our opinion a very speculative proposition and we would put its value around £750,000 (SEVEN HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND POUNDS) but we would add that this might be substantially increased should it prove possible to obtain a pre-letting of say 200,000 sq. ft. of office space prior to development starting: from past experience only Government Departments or nationalised industries are capable of absorbing so much space. [And then, finally:] We would again draw attention to the time limit on the outline planning permission.'

d The Town Centre board decided nevertheless to go ahead with its offer but with two variations: first, to omit the proposed letter of recommendation from the Rochdale board; and, secondly, to rephrase the second paragraph of its own circular letter to read:

e 'Your Directors have irrevocably undertaken to accept or obtain acceptance of the Offer in respect of holdings amounting in total to approximately 13.2 per cent. of the issued capital of Rochdale, and they have also undertaken to recommend other Stockholders to accept the Offer.'

The circular letter from Town Centre was dated 18th October.

f Other provisions to which I should refer were that the offer was to be conditional on 90 per cent acceptance in value and 75 per cent acceptance numerically of Rochdale stockholders, thus reflecting the provisions of s 209 of the Companies Act 1948. Town Centre could, however, be satisfied with smaller percentages but not less than 50 per cent in value. It was also provided that the offer would remain open until 8th November, unless extended by Town Centre down to but not after 9th December. The offer document described in general terms the fixed assets of Rochdale, which of course included the Dale Street Basin, and specified them at a book value of £276,000. No mention was made in the offer document of the adverse advice tendered to the Rochdale board by Messrs Henry Cooke & Son.

g On 28th October, however, the Rochdale board—again belatedly, in my view—issued a circular to the Rochdale shareholders. It recommended the Town Centre offer but concluded with this passage:

h 'Since Town Centre is a major stockholder in Rochdale, it was decided to consult Henry Cooke & Son, who have reached a conclusion that the terms of the Offer represent too large a discount on the current value of [Rochdale's] net assets. Your Directors disagree with this view and continue to recommend all Stockholders to accept the Offer, and they have undertaken to accept or obtain acceptances of the Offer in respect of £71,725 Consolidated Ordinary Stock (approximately 13.2 per cent. of the issued capital).'

i The complaint against the Rochdale and Town Centre boards is that the offer document ought not to have been sent out with the recommendation of the Rochdale board without concurrent disclosure of the fact that the financial advisers of Rochdale advised rejection and without a reasoned explanation from the Rochdale board of the grounds on which they turned down the advice of their financial advisers.

The plaintiffs in the action are four Rochdale stockholders, one of whom accepted the Town Centre offer, the other three of whom have not. They are expressed to be suing on behalf of themselves and other Rochdale stockholders except the defendants and their nominees. But I was told that for the purposes of this motion the plaintiffs were not seeking to sustain a representative capacity. The defendants are four Rochdale directors, Town Centre and Rochdale. a

The writ was issued on 5th November and claimed relief based on a breach of duty on the part of the Rochdale board and relief based on the existence of an alleged conspiracy between the Rochdale and Town Centre boards. The notice of motion seeks an injunction to restrain the Rochdale board from recommending the offer in any further way to the stockholders of Rochdale and also an injunction—and this is the principal relief sought—restraining Town Centre until judgment or further order from declaring or purporting to declare the offer unconditional. b

The argument of counsel for the plaintiffs—with whom I have some sympathy—is this, that the directors of Rochdale had a duty towards the Rochdale stockholders to provide them with proper information. The Rochdale directors were in breach of that duty when they permitted the Town Centre offer to go out with their expressed recommendation, without disclosure of the contrary advice of Messrs Henry Cooke & Son. Town Centre was clearly implicated in that wrongful act on the part of the Rochdale board. Therefore Town Centre should be enjoined against declaring their offer unconditional, thus freeing any assenting stockholders of Rochdale from the assent which they have already given. c

I accept that the directors of an offeree company have a duty towards their own shareholders, which in my view clearly includes a duty to be honest and a duty not to mislead. I also accept that a shareholder in an offeree company may be prejudiced if his co-shareholders are misled into accepting the offer. I express this view because as soon as the appropriate percentage of shareholders have been misled and have assented, the minority become subject under s 209 of the Companies Act 1948 to statutory powers of compulsory purchase. It therefore seems to me that a minority could complain if they were being wrongfully subjected to that power of compulsory purchase as a result of a breach of duty on the part of the board of the offeree company. d

In the case before me, in my judgment, having considered the evidence as a whole, it is clear to me that the Rochdale board honestly believed that an offer of £200 for £100 of Rochdale's stock was advantageous and ought to be recommended to the stockholders; and on considering the figures before me it is also clear to me that a director could reasonably hold that belief. In such circumstances it does not seem to me to be right that this court should interfere by way of interlocutory relief so as to prohibit the offeror company from declaring the offer unconditional if it so decides. The plaintiffs have other remedies if they do not wish to accept the Town Centre offer, if they wish to resile from an acceptance already given and if they are able to sustain that any wrong has been done. But I see no reason whatever on the facts of this case why the court should interfere with the conditional offer and the acceptances now subsisting between Town Centre and other Rochdale stockholders. e

I appreciate that the plaintiffs may be disenchanted with the offer made by Town Centre and dissatisfied with the explanation given by Rochdale for recommending it. On the other hand there may be many stockholders not parties to this action who are perfectly satisfied with Town Centre's offer and I see no sufficient reason why their contract should be placed in peril in the absence of bad faith on the part of the two boards or conduct so unreasonable as to approach bad faith. f

In those circumstances I decline to grant the relief sought by this motion. g

LORD DENNING MR, KARMINSKI AND ORR LJJ

24th, 25th, 26th JANUARY 1972

Divorce – Practice – Interrogatories – Adultery – Interrogatories inviting answers which tend to prove adultery allowable – Interrogatories which may properly be administered – Interrogatories necessary for disposing fairly of cause or matter or for saving costs – Interrogatory asking direct question whether couple had sexual intercourse – Civil Evidence Act 1968, s 16 (5) – RSC Ord 26, r 1.

In 1967 the husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery with the co-respondent. After the Divorce Reform Act 1969 came into force, he lodged a further petition on the ground of irretrievable breakdown of the marriage. The husband alleged that the wife had committed adultery on a holiday and also at the matrimonial home. He sought to administer interrogatories to the wife and to the co-respondent to prove adultery. He did not want to bring his daughter to court to prove that her mother had admitted adultery, or to incur the costs of an enquiry agent. The registrar allowed a number of interrogatories submitted by the husband but, on appeal, the judge disallowed these and himself drafted a set of interrogatories which he would be prepared to give leave to administer, including questions designed to discover whether the wife and co-respondent had occupied the same bedroom, but he refused to allow the question: did you have sexual intercourse? The judge did not however order that those interrogatories should be administered. The husband appealed seeking an order to administer the interrogatories drafted by the judge and the further interrogatory asking whether the couple had had sexual intercourse.

(i) it was permissible to administer interrogatories in a divorce case with the object of getting the respondent to answer whether or not he had committed adultery; the privilege afforded by the ecclesiastical courts to parties of refusing to answer questions tending to show that they had committed adultery had been replaced and supplanted by the statutory privilege contained in s 3^a of the Evidence Further Amendment Act 1869; since that statutory privilege had been abolished by s 16 (5)^b of the Civil Evidence Act 1968 there could be no objection to the administration of interrogatories, or to discovery of documents, in a suit charging adultery (see p 1174 b and p 1175 b and h, post); dictum of Lord Hodson in Skone v Skone [1971] 2 All ER at 587 applied; dictum of Ormrod J in A v A and H [1962] 2 All ER at 575 disapproved;

(ii) since the whole object of interrogatories was to make the party interrogated speak to the very matters which it was necessary for the party interrogating to prove in order to establish his case, the interrogatory asking the direct question whether the wife and the co-respondent had had sexual intercourse should be allowed in addition to those which the judge had stated were permissible; it could not be argued that they were not necessary for fairly disposing of the matter or for saving

^a Section 3 is set out at p 1173 e, post. The section was repealed, so far as it related to the High Court, by the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act 1925, s 226 and Sch 6, and replaced by s 198 of that Act. Section 198 was repealed by the Matrimonial Causes Act 1950 and subsequently re-enacted in s 43 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965

^b Section 16 (5) provides: 'A witness in any proceedings instituted in consequence of adultery, whether a party to the proceedings or not, shall not be excused from answering any question by reason that it tends to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery; and accordingly the proviso to section 3 of the Evidence Further Amendment Act 1869 and, in section 43 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965, the words from "but" to the end of the subsection shall cease to have effect.'

costs within the meaning of RSC Ord 26, r 1^e, for the husband did not wish to bring his daughter to court to prove the adultery, and it would be a waste of time and money to employ enquiry agents if the wife and co-respondent were ready to admit adultery (see p 1175 d e and h, post); dictum of A L Smith LJ in Kennedy v Dodson [1895] 1 Ch at 341 applied.

Per Curiam. The proper course when a judge does not accept the interrogatories as drafted by the party, but thinks that they would be permissible if drafted in a different form, is for the amendments to be made then and there by the judge, and for the judge to order them in the amended form (see p 1175 f and h, post); Nash v Layton [1911] 2 Ch 71 followed.

Decision of Payne J, p 95 ante, reversed in part.

Interlocutory appeal

This was an appeal by the husband, Peter Lawrence Nast, the petitioner for divorce on the ground of the wife's adultery, to vary the order of Payne J dated 30th July 1971 and reported at p 95 ante, whereby it was ordered that the appeal of the wife, Simone Nast, and the co-respondent, Arthur Walker, against the decision of Mr Registrar Stranger-Jones dated 7th May 1971 whereby the wife and co-respondent were ordered to answer certain interrogatories, should be allowed save that the judge settled a number of interrogatories relating to adultery alleged to have been committed by the wife and the co-respondent at an hotel in Devon which he ruled the husband was at liberty to administer if so advised. The facts are set out in the judgment of Lord Denning MR.

Leonard Caplan QC and Jonathan Sofer for the husband.

Ian Percival QC and Walter Blum for the wife.

The co-respondent did not appear and was not represented.

RSC Ord 26, r 1 (3), provides, so far as material: 'On the hearing of an application under this rule, the Court shall give leave as to such only of the interrogatories as it considers necessary either for disposing fairly of the cause or matter or for saving costs . . .'

LORD DENNING MR. The husband, Mr Nast, petitions for divorce against his wife, Mrs Nast. Originally, in 1967, the petition was on the ground of cruelty, but later on, by amendment, on the ground of adultery. Since the Divorce Reform Act 1969 another petition has been lodged on the ground of irretrievable breakdown of the marriage. The only question today is whether the husband should be allowed to administer interrogatories to the wife and also to the co-respondent in order to prove the adultery. It is alleged that they committed adultery on a holiday at Babbacombe in Devon, and also at the matrimonial home at Welling in Kent. A number of interrogatories were submitted to Payne J¹. He did not allow any of them. He made suggestions of his own², but did not order them to be answered. The husband appeals to this court. He seeks to administer interrogatories in the form suggested by Payne J² but with an additional one.

In the course of the hearing before us, counsel for the wife has raised a point of principle. He says that even today interrogatories are not admissible in the divorce court in order to prove adultery. Before 1851 the parties to a suit were not competent to give evidence themselves in it at all. So there was no question of interrogatories being allowed to prove adultery. By a series of statutes from 1851 to 1869 it was enacted that parties were competent and compellable to give evidence. But there was an exception in s 3 of the Evidence Further Amendment Act 1869 which provided:

‘The parties to any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, and the husbands and wives of such parties, shall be competent to give evidence in such proceeding: Provided that no witness in any proceeding, whether a party to the suit or not, shall be liable to be asked or bound to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery, unless such witness shall have already given evidence in the same proceeding in disproof of his or her alleged adultery.’

That section only says the parties shall be ‘competent’ to give evidence in any such proceedings. It does not say ‘compellable’. But this was implied. Several years ago I looked into all these statutes, and I stated the result in *Tilley v Tilley*³:

‘...every party to a divorce suit instituted in consequence of adultery is competent and compellable to give evidence, save only in so far as he can claim the privilege.’

I referred, of course, there to the statutory privilege, and not to any ecclesiastical or other privilege. In saying that a party is ‘compellable’ I meant that he was compellable not only to give evidence, but also to come to the court for the purpose.

Such was the law from 1869 onwards; the parties themselves were competent and compellable to give evidence and to answer any questions save insofar as they could claim the protection of that statutory privilege. In *Redfern v Redfern*⁴ the Court of Appeal considered the question of discovery in a divorce case. It was held that discovery of documents was not permissible in order to prove adultery. Equally, of course, interrogatories were not permissible. Counsel for the wife submitted to us that the reason for that decision was because adultery was an ecclesiastical offence, and that, as the ecclesiastical courts did not permit discovery in order to prove it, their practice was inherited by the divorce courts. I realise that there are some statements in that case which point in that direction. But I think that the decision is to be supported, not on any ecclesiastical privilege, but on the statutory privilege contained in s 3 of the 1869 Act. Many distinguished judges have since explained the decision in that way, notably Lord Esher MR in Spokes v The Grosvenor and *West End Railway Terminus Hotel Co Ltd*⁵, Sir Wilfrid Greene MR in *Campbell v Campbell*⁶ (explaining *Cavendish v Cavendish*⁷) and Karminski J in *Hulbert v Hulbert*⁸. In A v A and *H*⁹ Ormrod J expressed a contrary view; he said that the practice of refusing discovery is not derived from the statutory privilege, but—

But, after the discussion we have had in this court, I do not think that he was correct. No doubt there was in former times a privilege which was recognised by the ecclesiastical courts. But that privilege was replaced and supplanted by the statutory privilege contained in s 3 of the 1869 Act. After that Act the ecclesiastical privilege disappeared. Only the statutory privilege remained.

The statutory privilege remained on the statute book for years and years. In 1912 the Royal Commission¹⁰, presided over by Lord Gorell, recommended its abolition. In 1956 Lord Morton of Henryton’s commission¹¹ did likewise. In 1967 the Law Reform Committee¹², presided over by Lord Pearson, also recommended its abolition, saying¹³:

‘This privilege may have made good sense in 1869 when adultery (with or without other matrimonial offences) was the only ground for divorce a vinculo, and was also regarded as a serious social offence. Under the modern law and practice in matrimonial causes, it operates in an irrational and arbitrary fashion and is, in our view, a hindrance to the administration of justice in those cases to which it applies. The judges of the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division are not in favour of retaining it any longer; we too think that the sooner that it is abolished the better.’

In 1968 the recommendation was implemented. By s 16 (5) of the Civil Evidence Act 1968 the privilege was abolished. After its abolition, there could be no objection to the administration of interrogatories, or to discovery of documents in suits which charged adultery.

This is borne out by the recent decision of the House of Lords in *Skone v Skone*¹⁴. A husband petitioned for divorce on the ground of his wife’s adultery. He failed, but afterwards found a bundle of love letters. He sought a new trial. The Court of Appeal refused it, but the House of Lords allowed it. Lord Hodson said¹⁵:

‘The Court of Appeal seems wrongly to have been under the impression that discovery could not be had on an issue of adultery: see *Redfern v Redfern*¹⁶ where the rule based on the practice of the ecclesiastical courts and until recently embodied in s 43 (2) of the Matrimonial Causes Act 1965 was held to exclude discovery. This rule has, however, now been abrogated by s 16 of the Civil Evidence Act 1968, which came into force on 26th October 1968.’

After citing the abrogation, he said¹⁷:

a 'The position is, therefore, that the husband could have obtained discovery from both the wife and the co-respondent . . .'

That shows that, since the 1968 Act, the court will order discovery of documents relating to adultery. So *Redfern v Redfern*¹⁸ is no longer law. The same must apply to interrogatories. Now that the statutory privilege has gone, interrogatories can be administered in a divorce case, with the object of getting the respondent to answer whether or no he has committed adultery.

b The old ecclesiastical privilege arose at a time when adultery was regarded as equivalent to a criminal offence. A party in this answer could object that it tended to incriminate him. Nowadays the thunders of the Church have lost their force. Even society does not condemn adultery as once it did. It is still a grave moral offence but not one which enables a person to object to answering questions about it.

c The next question is: what interrogatories should be allowed? Payne J formulated¹⁹ a number of interrogatories, which seem to be reasonable, to discover whether or not the wife and the co-respondent occupied the same bedroom; but the judge stopped short of allowing the direct question: did you have sexual intercourse the one with the other? I think that question should be allowed as well. The whole object of interrogatories is to make the party interrogated speak to the very matters

d which it is necessary for the party interrogating to prove in order to establish his case: see per A L Smith LJ in *Kennedy v Dodson*²⁰. It would be quite in order for the interrogatories simply to ask whether the couple went on holiday together to Devon, whether they occupied the same bedroom, and whether they had sexual intercourse together. Similar interrogatories would be permissible in regard to the matrimonial home. But counsel for the wife says that these interrogatories do not come within RSC Ord 26, r 1. He says that they are not necessary for fairly disposing of the matter or for saving costs. I cannot accept this argument. The husband does not wish to bring his own daughter to court to prove that her mother committed adultery. And it would be a waste of time and money to employ enquiry agents to inspect hotel registers, and so forth, if the couple are ready to admit adultery.

e Finally, a question was raised as to the proper course when the judge, as here, does not accept the interrogatories as drafted by the party, but thinks that they would be permissible if drafted in a different form. The practice, as I have always understood it, is for the amendments to be made then and there, and for the judge to order them in the amended form. Such was done in *Nash v Layton*¹.

f I would, therefore, allow this appeal. Interrogatories can be administered as drafted by Payne J¹⁹ but with the addition of the one which was asked for by counsel g for the husband.

KARMINSKI LJ. I am entirely of the same opinion as Lord Denning MR. Although this is a matter which raises some interesting points of principle, I do not think I can usefully add anything to what has fallen from Lord Denning MR in his judgment, and I agree that the order which he proposes should be made.

h ORR LJ. I also agree.

Appeal allowed. Leave to appeal to the House of Lords refused.

Thomas v Notts Incorporated Football Club Ltd ^a

1st, 2nd DECEMBER 1971

Guarantee – Right of surety to exoneration from liability – Demand by creditor – Liability of surety only to arise on demand by creditor – No demand made – Guarantee by director of company's overdraft with bank – Director resigning and notifying bank to determine guarantee – No demand made by bank against director – Whether director entitled in equity to require club to exonerate him from liability to bank by paying off overdraft. ^b

The plaintiff, who was a director of the defendant club, an incorporated football club, guaranteed the club's overdraft with its bankers up to £5,000. His liability under the guarantee was to arise on demand on him of all money and liabilities whether certain or contingent. A paragraph in the guarantee provided that it should be a continuing security until receipt by the bank from him of a notice in writing to discontinue it. As a result of a difference of opinion with his fellow directors in 1966 the plaintiff resigned from the board of the club on 7th February 1967. He then gave notice to the bank which was received by them on 12th February; they then closed the account for which he was liable. The plaintiff claimed a declaration that he had a right in equity to require the club to exonerate him from his liability under the guarantee by paying it off. ^c

Held – Once an account had been closed and there was an accrued fixed liability, a surety was entitled to be discharged from all liability under his guarantee by calling on the debtor to pay off the amount due. It was immaterial that the creditor was bound to make a demand on the surety before he could proceed against him and that no such demand had in fact been made. Accordingly the plaintiff was entitled to the declaration sought (see p 1182 d e and g h, post). ^d

This was an action by Stanley Thomas against the Notts Incorporated Football Club Ltd, of which he was formerly a director, whereby he claimed a declaration that he was entitled to be discharged and exonerated from his liability under a guarantee of the defendant club's current account, given to their bank, Lloyds Bank Ltd, Nottingham, by payment by the defendants to the bank of £17,233 11s 10d or such other sum as was due on that account on the date when the bank closed the account together with the interest thereon and an order that the defendants pay to the bank such sum and interest and obtain cancellation and return of the plaintiff's guarantee. The facts are set out in the judgment.

- d* Michael Albery QC and Michael Essayan for the plaintiff.
Leolin Price QC and Gavin Lightman for the defendants.

GOFF J. The facts on which this case turns are few, clear and indeed admitted, but the relevant law is a more difficult matter.

- e* The plaintiff was a director of the defendant company and as such he guaranteed the defendants' overdraft with their bankers, limited to £5,000. By that guarantee, his liability was made to arise on demand on him of all money and liabilities, whether certain or contingent and so forth, together with interest. Paragraph 2 of the guarantee said that it should be a continuing security binding him and his personal representatives until the receipt by the bank from him or them of notice in writing to discontinue it.

- f* In March or April 1966 a difference of opinion arose between the plaintiff and his fellow directors, or some of them, concerning the chairmanship and vice-chairmanship of the defendant company. As a result, the plaintiff lost his enthusiasm for the company. I am not in this action concerned with the rights or wrongs of that difference of opinion, but the result of it was that the plaintiff, after failing to attend meetings for some considerable time, finally resigned from the board on 7th February 1967. It appears that there might be some doubt as to the regularity of the meeting on that day, but no point is made of that, and it is accepted that the plaintiff did in truth retire.

- g* Having so retired, the plaintiff then exercised his undoubted right under cl 2, to which I have referred, to determine his guarantee. That, of course, did not exonerate him from liability on it in respect of the position as it then stood, but it made it cease to be operative for the future. The relevant notice for that purpose was received from the plaintiff by the bank on 12th February 1967 and they closed the old account for which he was liable. They had indeed closed it earlier, when certain other retiring directors had taken the same course. Some doubt appears to exist as to the precise figure for which the plaintiff is liable on the guarantee, and that is made a little more difficult by the fact that after closing the account on 31st March 1966, when other directors determined their guarantees, the bank went on debiting cheques already drawn but not yet presented. That, however, is a question of machinery only. It is common ground that the liability is fixed, accrued and ascertainable; and, if the plaintiff is otherwise right, the uncertainty at this precise moment as to the true figure is irrelevant.

i Those being the facts, the plaintiff claims that he has a right in equity to require the defendants to exonerate him from his liability under the guarantee by paying it off. He founds that on the case of *Ascherson v Tredegar Dry Dock and Wharf Co Ltd*¹, and later cases in which *Ascherson*¹ has been followed and applied. The defendants, on the other hand, say that Ascherson's case¹ does not apply, because in that case either it was unnecessary for the creditor to make a demand on the surety before he could proceed against him, or, if it were necessary, such a demand had been made; whereas in the present case it is clear, as I have read, that a demand had to be made, and it is equally clear that had not been done; and the defendants say that that makes all the difference. In the submission of the defendants, there is no case inconsistent with that distinction and one case, *Bradford v Gammon*², which is, they say, an express decision in their favour, or, if it be not, is at least an authority which supports them. I have, therefore, to look at the line of cases and see exactly where they lead.

Starting with *Ascherson*¹, whilst it is said³ that the bank had claimed the sum in question by their letter of 5th December 1908, the statement of facts shows, in my view, that they had not demanded payment. The surety in that case had died, and the bank gave formal notice of liability to the executors, but, as is expressly stated⁴, they did not, at that time at all events, demand payment of the overdraft. Later the executors, wishing to know the financial position, enquired of the bank, which replied by the letter of 5th December 1908⁴:

"The balance due to the bank on June 30 last, the date on which we received notice of the death of Mr. Edward Ascherson, was 17,219l. On that day the account was stopped, and all transactions have gone through a new account since that date, so that our claim against the estate of the late Mr. Edward Ascherson is 17,219l. with interest thereon from June 30 last."

In the context in which that letter was written, I do not regard that as a demand for payment. Turning to the judgment, I look to see on what principle it proceeded, and I find that in a passage where Swinfen Eady J said⁵:

"It has been the law of the Court for very many years that a surety is entitled to come into equity to compel the principal debtor to pay what is due from him, to the intent that the surety may be relieved. In *Ranelagh v. Hayes*⁶ the Lord Keeper "compared it to the case of a counter-bond; where although the surety is not troubled or molested for the debt, yet at any time after the money becomes payable on the original bond, this Court will decree the principal"—that is, the principal debtor—"to discharge the debt; it being unreasonable that a man should always have such a cloud hang over him". Then in *Nisbet v. Smith*⁷ the Lord Chancellor says: "It is clear and never has been disputed that a surety, generally speaking, may come into this Court, and apply for the purpose of compelling the principal debtor for whom he is surety to pay in the money, and deliver him from the obligation."

Those words express the principle in perfectly general terms.

The next case which arose in this matter was the case of *Morrison v Barking Chemicals Co Ltd*⁸. In that case, the action failed, on any view of the matter, because the guarantee was still continuing and there was no ascertained, ascertainable or accrued liability. But Sargant J made certain relevant observations. Having adverted to the all-important point that the guarantee was continuing, he then went on⁹:

a '... and it [i.e. the Ascherson case¹⁰] also differs in another point on which counsel for the defendant company laid much stress, but which hardly seems to me vital—namely, that there the bank, in taking the initiative in recovering from the surety, had not to make a previous demand, while here it would have to do so.'

b The guarantee in the Ascherson case¹⁰ does not appear from the report. It seems from that passage that it was a case in which demand was not necessary; but it will be seen that Sargant J did not think the distinction vital. Then, at the end of his judgment, he said this¹¹:

c 'I desire to add that I have not to deal with the case, which was much debated before me, of what would happen if the bank took the initiative in closing the current account and then abstained from making a demand on the surety. The case is not a probable one. But I must not be assumed to acquiesce in the argument of counsel for the defendant company that in such a case the surety could not clear himself, as in *Ascherson v Tredegar Dry Dock and Wharf Co.*¹⁰. The surety might be in as great peril [and then it says "as in the case supposed", but I think that "as" must be an error, and it should read: The surety might be in as great peril] in the case supposed, although there might be no complete cause of action until demand. I am assuming, of course, that the guarantee was not determined, or liable to be determined, by the surety.'

d Those last words, I think, are explained by the fact that under the terms of that guarantee there was immediate liability on determination by the surety of the guarantee. That passage clearly saves the point which the defendants have argued in this case; but it also, in my judgment, clearly expresses a grave doubt whether the point is right.

e Then the matter arose again in *Bradford v Gammon*¹², which was a case of an indemnity given by surviving partners to the personal representatives of a deceased partner, and it was a case in which no demand for payment was ever made. The head-note, which is accurate in this respect, states¹³:

f 'In an action by the plaintiff as legal personal representative of the deceased partner against his four co-partners as defendants claiming specific performance of the partnership agreement and requiring a proper discharge and release from all the liabilities of the partnership, particularly in respect of the overdraft at the bank:—Held, that the ordinary covenant contained in the agreement to indemnify the estate of a deceased partner did not entitle the plaintiff to insist upon the immediate payment of debts for which no demand had been made. The obligation to make good the indemnity by payment and the right to enforce the covenant arose when the demand for payment was made and not before. *Ascherson v. Tredegar Dry Dock and Wharf Co.*¹⁴ distinguished.'

g Eve J in his judgment said¹⁵:

h 'The question between the parties does not arise in this case upon any implied obligation imposed upon the surviving partners as purchasers, but upon the construction of the clause I have read from the partnership articles.'

And he took up the Ascherson case¹⁴ with these words¹⁶:

'[Counsel for the plaintiff] has mainly relied on the case of *Ascherson v. Tredegar Dry Dock and Wharf Co.*¹⁷, but in one important respect the position there differed essentially from what it is here. The plaintiff there was the executor of a surety and the defendant was the principal debtor. The creditors were bankers, and, as here, so soon as they learned of the death of the surety they closed the account, and later on informed the surety's executor of the amount owing and, as the learned judge found, made a demand upon him for payment.'

Pausing there, with respect, for the reasons which I have given, I think that was an error; but, at the same time, it was a case in which demand was not required, and therefore that particular error may not be very significant. Eve J continued¹⁸:

'In these circumstances it was held that the surety's executor was entitled to an order upon the principal debtor to pay the debt. But here the creditors have made no demand for payment, and the position existing is that referred to by Sargant J. in the concluding paragraph of his judgment in *Morrison v. Barking Chemicals Co.*¹⁹, where he says [and he then quotes from *Morrison*¹⁹. He goes on:] He adds: "The case is not a probable one," but it happens to be this very case, and I have now to decide whether in the absence of any demand for payment by the creditor the circumstances are brought within the principle of the two cases I have referred to. I do not think they are. It may be of course that the plaintiff could pay off the bank and then sue the defendants, and by these means get rid of the liability; but that is a possibility which does not touch the problem with which I have to deal in this action, which can be stated thus. [It is pertinent to observe how he does state it:] Does the ordinary covenant to pay partnership debts and to indemnify the outgoing partner or the estate of the deceased partner against debt and liabilities entitle the retiring partner or the legal personal representative of the deceased partner to insist upon the immediate payment of debts for which no demand for payment has been made? I do not think it does. So long as the covenantee is kept indemnified he cannot in my opinion insist upon the covenantor discharging debts for which no demand has been made; the obligation to make good the indemnity by payment and the right to enforce the covenant arises when the demand is made and not before.'

Now, if that be a decision in principle, apart from the particular contract, then it is, as the defendants say, an express decision in their favour, and the only question is whether it be right or wrong. But it was suggested later, as will appear, that in truth it was not a decision on general principle, but on the particular contract then before the court. I accept that view; and, therefore, in my judgment, this is not an express authority in favour of the defendants.

I pass on to see what has been said since. I will next refer to the case of *Re Anderson-Berry*²⁰. That was a case of a different character. The plaintiffs were sureties under an administration bond, and the administrator was actually threatening to commit a devastavit. It was therefore a clear ground for anticipating jeopardy, and a proper case for quia timet relief. But Sargant LJ made observations on the matter with which I have to deal. He said¹:

'In such cases as that of *Ascherson v. Tredegar Dry Dock and Wharf Co.*¹⁷ the jurisdiction which was exercised was to a considerable extent quia timet, because there the position was this, that the five directors of the company had given a guarantee; then one of them died and the bank were quite satisfied to rest on a the guarantee. The deceased director had left a large estate and they were perfectly satisfied with his guarantee together with the other guarantees and they were prepared to let the guarantee go on indefinitely. They had ascertained the amount and the result would have been that the company could have gone on trading with the benefit of the guarantee on which this sum of 17,000l. had already accrued and it would not have been necessary for the new directors

b or directors who came in, to join in any guarantee to the same extent to which the original guarantor had joined in the guarantee. I only mention those facts, because I was counsel in that case, and I have some special acquaintance with the facts, for the purpose of pointing out that there was no probability at all at that time of the debt of the executors of the testator being due within any measurable distance of time [it has been suggested that the words "being due" there really mean "being demanded"], and yet it was held that they were entitled to come to the Court and get an order on the company to pay the bank, because this cloud should not be left hanging over the estate. That is an instance of quia timet.²

That reinforces that the principle of *Ascherson*² was that the surety was entitled to remove the cloud, and that in that case he was allowed to do it where there was no immediate jeopardy and indeed no probability at that time of the debt being due or demanded within any measurable distance of time. Then Sargant LJ continued³:

e 'The case of *Wooldridge v. Norris*⁴, which is relied on very much by the learned judge in *Ascherson v. Tredegar Dry Dock and Wharf Co.*², was an even clearer case of the application of the doctrine of quia timet. That being so, and the doctrine being applied in cases of guarantee, I think there could hardly be a clearer instance of a case in which that doctrine is applicable'.

Then he goes on to say that in that case there was a definite threat. The actual case is clearly distinguishable and was not relied on by the plaintiff as a decision, but it is relevant to this examination of the authorities because of the observations made by Sargant LJ on the Ascherson case².

f Then I come to *Tate v Crewdson*⁵, in which the case of *Bradford v Gammon*⁶ was expressly considered by Morton J. That was a case in which there was no demand; but, in any event, there the surety was liable without a demand because, whilst as between himself and the other borrower he was to be considered as a surety only, as between himself and the creditor he was a principal; and it is well settled that in the case of a direct creditor-debtor relationship, as distinct from a surety, the provision that the money shall be payable on demand does not import the necessity of giving a demand before action. But Morton J said⁷:

h 'In the case which was decided between Ascherson's case² and *Re Anderson-Berry, Harris v. Griffith*⁸—*Bradford v. Gammon*⁶—EVE, J., held that the plaintiff in that case was not entitled to have a certain overdraft on the partnership account at the bank paid off. I need not deal with the case in detail, because I think it was a decision upon the construction of a clause in the partnership articles which was in question [and I respectfully agree with Morton J in that conclusion]; but EVE, J., referred to Ascherson's case², and distinguished it, on the ground that there was in Ascherson's case² a demand for payment by the bank. I think that that particular ground of distinction cannot be relied upon, and no doubt if EVE, J., had had before him at that time the information which was subsequently given by SARGANT, L.J., in *Re Anderson-Berry*⁹, he could not have distinguished Ascherson's case¹⁰ on that ground, though no doubt he would have arrived at the same conclusion on the construction of the particular document before him.' a

There we find another judge criticising the distinction which the defendants seek to draw. b

The only other case is that of *Watt v Mortlock*¹¹. There, of course, there had been a demand, since that was a case of a security given by the surety, and the bank had threatened to enforce its security. Wilberforce J, at first blush, doubted whether the court was justified in granting relief; but then he considered the cases to which he had been referred—namely, *Ascherson*¹⁰, *Tate v Crewdson*¹², and *Anderson-Berry*⁹—and concluded¹³: c

'On those authorities, it seems to me that the court should grant a surety in the position of the present plaintiff the relief which is asked'.

Then he went on to deal with the form of order.

Now, such being the state of the authorities, there is, as I see it, no concluded decision on the question whether there is any difference between the case where it is unnecessary to give a demand, or a demand has been made, on the one hand, and the case where a demand is required and not given, on the other; and, in my judgment, that is not a valid distinction. It seems to me clearly contrary to the general principle on which *Ascherson*¹⁰ was decided, a principle which had been noted in ancient cases before that. The principle is that the surety is entitled to remove the cloud which is hanging over him. It would be strange indeed, as it seems to me, if he can do that where no demand is required, notwithstanding there is no present likelihood of any attempt to recover against him, and yet when his liability arises as between himself and the creditor only on demand, he cannot seek to remove the cloud until it has started to rain, especially as the provision in the contract of suretyship that the creditor must make a demand on the surety is clearly a provision for the benefit of the surety. It would be odd, I think, if that provision served as between himself and the principal debtor to put himself in a much worse position than that in which he would stand if it was not there. d

I therefore say and hold that the *Ascherson*¹⁰ principle is not dependent on demand being made where the suretyship contract requires a demand. Of course, there may be particular cases where, as a matter of contract, as in *Bradford v Gammon*¹⁴, the right is not available to the surety; but as a general principle, in my judgment, once the account is closed and there is an accrued fixed liability, the surety is entitled to this quia timet relief, whether the case be one in which no demand was required to be made, or one in which it was and a demand has been made, or one in which it was and no demand has been made. I distinguish *Bradford v Gammon*¹⁴ as having turned on the particular contract in that case; but, if necessary, if I am wrong as to that, then I respectfully agree with my predecessors who have cast doubt on it, and I say that it was wrong in drawing a distinction based on no demand; and, with respect, I decline to follow it. g

In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiff has established the right on which he sues. But I have to consider another matter, because the defendants have a substantive j a defence of their own. They say that, granted that the principle on which the plaintiff relies is as I have held, still this particular plaintiff is not, in the circumstances of this case, entitled to relief. They base that on the fact that, whilst he was a director, the defendant company issued a prospectus to support an issue of further shares in order to raise money then much needed by the club. Indeed, the prospectus said: 'An immediate and substantial response to this issue is vital to the club's security and prosperity'.

b A substantial number of shares were taken up in response to that prospectus, and I have no doubt that some (if not all) of the applications were made whilst the plaintiff was still a director. In any event, he was responsible for the prospectus, because he was a director when it was issued; and, apart from whatever the general law would say, it was specifically stated on the front cover that the directors collectively and individually accepted full responsibility for the accuracy of the information given.

c Now, unfortunately, one of the statements in the prospectus was not wholly accurate, because item 12 in Part II was as follows:

d 'The Directors of the Company do not have any interest in the promotion of the issue of this capital apart from their general interest as Directors and Shareholders.'

e That was of necessity qualified, because in Part I, where the defendant company's liabilities were set out, it was stated that the present directors had loans of £24,600. But the point is taken that the plaintiff (and I think other directors at the time also, but it does not matter) had an interest in the promotion of the issue of this capital, which was not disclosed, because of the guarantee and the right which it carried to require payment off of the overdraft, and the existence of the guarantee was nowhere stated. Mr Hopcroft, the present vice-chairman of the defendants, was called to give evidence to support this defence, but that does not help me, because it was quite clear that he knew all about the guarantees and relied on some independent assurance, which he says he had received, that the guarantees would not be called in; and so I have to decide the case apart from that evidence.

f Now, any shareholder who could satisfy the court that he applied for an allotment of shares on the faith of the prospectus and that he was misled by the non-disclosure of the guarantees would have an action against the defendants, possibly to set aside the allotment, or for damages. If fraud were established—and this is not, let me say, a case of fraud—then he would have a direct action against the directors; and, for all I know, he might possibly be able to mount some action against the directors in the absence of fraud. What is said is that the plaintiff having been, without any moral turpitude, party to this inaccurate statement, is not only exposed to such action (if any) as the shareholders may have against him, but wholly forfeits his right to require the guarantee to be paid off.

g Reliance is placed on the case of *Hirachand Punamchand v Temple*¹⁵. This appears to me to be an extravagant and alarming proposition, for it would follow that if h the directors' loans had been wrongly stated, they would be precluded from ever recovering the money. Be that as it may, the case of *Hirachand Punamchand*¹⁵ is, in my judgment, very different. There, creditors applied to the debtor's father in the hope of getting him to pay the debt which they could not get out of the son, and he paid them part of what was due, making it clear in terms that he did so on the footing that it should discharge the whole debt. They did not raise any query; j they accepted the money, and they cashed the cheque. The money was therefore paid and received on that express footing. Then they turned round and said 'Now we will sue the son for the balance'; and, not surprisingly, the Court of Appeal refused to allow them to do so. They put it on various grounds; and the defendants rely, as indeed is all they can do, on certain passages in the respective judgments. First, 'Vaughan Williams LJ said¹⁶:

'Having said thus much, I desire to add a word or two with regard to the case of *Cook v. Lister*¹⁷ in the Common Pleas. If the judgments in that case are looked at, it will be found that Willes J. said, in explaining the grounds of his judgment, that, under circumstances like those of the present case, the debt is gone, because it would be a fraud upon the stranger who pays part of a debt in discharge of the whole, that an action should be brought for the debt. I have founded my judgment upon the grounds which I have already expressed, but I do not wish to be understood as thereby negating the proposition that a defence might be set up on the alternative basis mentioned by Willes J.'

Then Fletcher Moulton LJ said¹⁸:

'It is perfectly clear from the previous correspondence that this was an offer made for the full settlement of the claim. The plaintiffs, with knowledge that this was the money of the father, sent to them in full settlement of the claim, took the draft, and cashed it, and kept the money. They must be taken to have known that they could only do this rightly, if they agreed to the terms that it should be in full settlement of the debt. Their action was inconsistent with the duty of an honest man, unless, at the time when they took the money, they accepted the terms on which it was offered . . . I decline to accept the conclusion of fact suggested by the plaintiffs that they dishonestly possessed themselves of the father's money, and shall presume that they did so honestly, and therefore that they accepted it in settlement of their claim against the son on the promissory note.'

Finally, Farwell LJ said¹⁹:

'I agree with Fletcher Moulton L.J. that the plaintiffs cannot be heard to say that they have acted dishonestly when an honest construction can be put upon their conduct by treating their acceptance and retention of the money as being upon the terms on which it was offered.'

That is an altogether stronger case. There is no semblance of a representation here that the money would not be used to discharge the overdraft, or even that it would not be so used at the instance of the directors. I cannot come to the conclusion that it would be dishonest to allow the plaintiff to exercise his right which, apart from this defence, is a right which I have held to be good in equity.

It is unfortunate that this paragraph was not wholly accurate and, as I have said, the shareholders may have their remedies, although I am a little inclined to doubt whether it would have made any difference if the guarantees had been stated. But I am quite satisfied that it would be going much too far and would be an inaccurate application of the principle in the Hirachand case²⁰ were I to hold that what has happened in this case has wholly deprived the plaintiff of his right in equity to require the defendants to pay off the overdraft and so remove the cloud hanging over his head.

The plaintiff is therefore entitled to a declaration; and, having regard to the doubt about the precise figure and the fact that the account was closed because of other directors' actions before the plaintiff determined his guarantee, it occurred to me a —and I suggested to counsel and understand that they agree—that the right form of order would be: ‘A declaration that the plaintiff is entitled to be discharged and exonerated from all liability under the plaintiff’s guarantee by payment by the defendants to the bank of the sum of £17,233. 11. 10 or such other sum as was due to the bank on the defendants’ said account on the 12th February, 1967, being the date when the bank received notice determining his guarantee, together with such interest as may be or become due until the date of payment; an order that the defendants do pay forthwith to the bank such sum and interest as aforesaid and obtain the cancellation and return of the plaintiff’s guarantee and take any other steps necessary for such discharge and exoneration as aforesaid’, with liberty to apply. COURT OF APPEAL, CIVIL DIVISION

f Rent tribunal – Reference of contract – Jurisdiction – Reference by local authority – Validity of reference – Test – Whether reference made mala fide or frivolously, capriciously or vexatiously – Relevance of factors taken into or left out of account – Views of tenants – Likelihood of reductions of rent – Block references without individual consideration – Court’s power to review administrative decision – Rent Act 1968, s 72 (1).

g Pressed by a local housing action group to exercise their powers under s 72 (1)^a of the Rent Act 1968 to refer contracts of tenancy to the rent tribunal in respect of furnished properties, Camden London Borough Council sent their valuation officers to make enquiries about certain tenancy agreements and the premises to which they related. The valuation officers interviewed 22 tenants and reported that the rents were a little high, but on hearing of the council’s action the landlords took steps to prevent the officers interviewing tenants of their other houses. At a meeting of the housing committee the town clerk reported what he had learned from the valuation officers and advised that as the decision in R v Paddington and St Marylebone Rent Tribunal, ex parte Bell London and Provincial Properties Ltd^b had rather stultified the effect of s 72, there was in the circumstances little chance of success in any such reference. Representatives of the action group attending gave reasons for differing from that view and urged the council to exercise their powers. At a subsequent meeting to which the matter was adjourned the committee had before them counsel’s opinion in favour of action being taken, a report from a councillor against a reference as not being in the best interests of the tenants, and a statement by the chief legal officer summing up the feelings of the tenants as conveyed to the valuation officers as being that the council would receive a measure of support from tenants in making the reference, although some tenants were against it and others supporting it would not attend at the rent tribunal to say so. Particulars of the sizes of the rooms let (they were all small), of the numbers of persons occupying each room, the rent, the condition of the premises, the standard of furnishing, and the facilities were all before the committee. The committee resolved to exercise the council's powers under s 72 and the council ratified that decision. The landlords applied for an order of prohibition to prevent the rent tribunal from considering the 22 agreements on the ground that the council had exceeded their powers in making the reference, and supported it with affidavits by tenants that they did not want their tenancy agreements referred and by affidavits of three councillors that they had no recollection of the views of tenants being brought to their attention at the committee meeting.

Held – The council's reference to the rent tribunal must be upheld for the following reasons—

(i) (per Salmon and Edmund Davies LJJ) it was impossible to say that the council had acted ultra vires in making the reference to the rent tribunal unless it could be shown that they were acting mala fide (which had not been suggested) or that they were acting frivolously, capriciously or vexatiously (the onus of proving which was on the landlords); having regard to the fact that the council's decision did not affect the basic rights of the landlords, the decision would not necessarily be vitiated by reason of the fact that the council had taken into account some irrelevant factor or had failed to consider some relevant matter (see p 1189 b to e, p 1192 c and p 1194 f to p 1195 a and e f, post);

(ii) (per Salmon and Edmund Davies LJJ) the landlords had failed to discharge the onus of proving that the council had acted other than properly in making the reference; they had gone carefully into the facts and had before them the details of each of the 22 tenancies; they had taken counsel's opinion and acted in accordance with it; although the council had made a single decision with regard to all the tenancies, the reference could not be described as a 'block reference'; the evidence showed that the council had taken the tenants' views into account, and in any event the council were entitled to make the reference even though the tenants themselves did not want references to be made; furthermore it could not be objected that there was no likelihood of the rents being reduced, for (per Salmon LJ) there was ample material on which they could conclude that there was something for the tribunal to consider and a reasonable likelihood that it might reduce the rents and (per Edmund Davies LJ) other circumstances might in any event justify the reference (see p 1190 h, p 1191 b to g, p 1192 d, p 1193 a, p 1195 h, p 1196 a and b, p 1197 a and p 1198 f to h, post);

(iii) (per Stamp LJ) in the absence of any allegation that the council had been acting ultra vires or mala fide the proceedings were misconceived; the court had no power to examine purely administrative decisions of local authorities not affecting rights to see if all factors had been properly taken into account; s 72 of the 1968 Act conferred the same unrestricted right to refer a tenancy agreement to the rent tribunal on the council as it did on the tenant and the landlord and it was wrong in principle for the High Court, on an application for prohibition, to go into the merits of the reference or into whether the council had made mistakes in coming to their conclusion (see p 1197 d to g and h to p 1198 a and d, post).

The landlords, Frey Investments Ltd, appealed against an order of the Queen's Bench Divisional Court (Lord Widgery CJ, O'Connor and Lawson JJ) made on 28th July 1971 and reported at [1971] 3 All ER 759 dismissing the landlords' application for an order prohibiting the rent tribunal for Barnet and Camden from hearing and determining 22 references to it made by Camden London Borough Council under

e Part VI of the Rent Act 1968. The references related to four tenancies at 36 Bartholomew Villas, and 18 tenancies at several addresses in Patshull Road, namely two at No 9, five at No 11, one at No 13, nine at No 37 and one at No 42, all in London NW 5.

The grounds of appeal were as follows: the Divisional Court was wrong in law in holding that the references made by Camden London Borough Council to Barnet and

f Camden Rent Tribunal were properly made in accordance with the provisions of Part VI of the Rent Act 1968, on the evidence and for the following reasons (so far as relied on before the court): the 22 references were invalid because they were not made in the bona fide exercise of the powers conferred on the council by s 72 of the Rent Act 1968 in that: (i) the council had not received any complaint from any of the 22 tenants referred to in the references that their rents were unreasonable; (ii) the

g council had not received any statement or other indication from any of the 22 tenants that they desired to refer their tenancies to the tribunal but feared the consequences of so doing; (iii) the council had not made any or any proper or sufficient enquiry whether the rents payable by the 22 tenants were unreasonable; (iv) the council by their duly authorised servants or agents had gained access to certain of the premises by deception and had interfered with the lawful right of at least one tenant to refrain

h from completing form FR5 sent to him by the tribunal or to complete such form after taking proper advice in relation thereto. The facts are set out in the judgment of Salmon LJ.

Ronald Bernstein QC and E J Prince for the landlords.

J S Colyer for the council.

The tribunal did not appear and was not represented.

SALMON LJ. The appellants (whom I will refer to as 'the landlords') applied to the Divisional Court for an order of prohibition to prevent the Barnet and Camden Rent Tribunal from considering 22 tenancy agreements which had been referred to it by Camden Borough Council for consideration. The basis of the application for an order of prohibition was that the borough council had exceeded their powers in referring these tenancy agreements to the rent tribunal. The Divisional Court¹ refused the order, and against that decision the landlords now appeal. a

The section under which the reference was made by the council is s 72 of the Rent Act 1968. Section 72 (1) provides:

‘Either the lessor or the lessee under a Part VI contract or the local authority may refer the contract to the rent tribunal for the district in question.’ b

Then sub-s (2) provides that when there has been such a reference the tribunal may require the landlords to supply it with such information as the tribunal reasonably requires. Subsection (3) provides for penalties which can be exacted from the landlords in the event of their failing to supply the information without reasonable cause.

Section 73 (1), omitting the immaterial words, provides as follows: c

‘(1) Where a Part VI contract is referred to a rent tribunal . . . the tribunal shall consider it and then, after making such inquiry as they think fit and giving to each party to the contract . . . an opportunity of being heard or, at his or their option, of submitting representations in writing, the tribunal, subject to subsections (2) and (3) below,—(a) shall approve the rent payable under the contract, or (b) shall reduce the rent to such sum as they may, in all the circumstances, think reasonable, or (c) may if they think fit in all the circumstances, dismiss the reference, and shall notify the parties and the local authority of their decision.’ d

I need not read sub-ss (2), (3) or (4). Subsection (5) is in these terms:

‘Notwithstanding anything in this Part of this Act, a rent tribunal shall not be required to entertain a reference made otherwise than by the local authority if they are satisfied . . . that the reference is frivolous or vexatious.’ e

I consider it of the utmost importance to uphold the right, and indeed the duty, of the courts to ensure that powers shall not be exercised unlawfully which have been conferred on a local authority or the executive, or indeed anyone else, when the exercise of such powers affects the basic rights of an individual. The court should be alert to see that such powers conferred by statute are not exceeded or abused, and I hope that nothing that I say in this judgment will be construed as in any way casting doubt on the principle which I have just enunciated. f

Counsel for the landlords in the course of his most interesting argument has referred us to a number of authorities on this topic and he cites in particular the judgment of Lord Greene MR in *Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp*². The passage on which he relies sums up Lord Greene MR’s opinion: g

‘. . . the court is entitled to investigate the action of the local authority with a view to seeing whether they have taken into account matters which they ought not to take into account, or, conversely, have refused to take into account or neglected to take into account matters which they ought to take into account. Once that question is answered in favour of the local authority, it may still be possible to say that, although the local authority have kept within the four corners of the matters which they ought to consider, they have nevertheless come to a conclusion so unreasonable that no reasonable authority could ever have come to it.’ h a whether the local authority had come to a right conclusion when considering an application to allow cinemas owned by the plaintiffs to be opened on a Sunday.

There have been a number of other cases to which we have been referred such as *Hanks v Minister of Housing and Local Government*³ and *Hall & Co Ltd v Shoreham-by-Sea Urban District Council*⁴. Cases such as these in which a licence is being sought for the purpose of enabling the applicant to carry on his business and earn his living or in which town planning permission is sought or a compulsory purchase order is being challenged vitally affect the basic rights of the persons concerned and seem to me to differ very substantially from the case which we are now considering. In a case such as the present, no decision is taken by the authority invested with a power which vitally affects the basic rights of the individual. The only decision taken by the council is to refer the matter to the rent tribunal so that the tribunal may consider whether or not the rent is too high. The party concerned (i.e. the landlords) have every opportunity of appearing before the tribunal, and it is the decision of that tribunal which affects their basic rights.

b For my part I doubt whether the principle laid down by Lord Greene MR applies, or was intended to apply, to cases of the present kind. For example, I think it would be difficult to suppose that, if the council referred the matter to the rent tribunal without having considered some material matter, that would necessarily vitiate the reference. I say that particularly because under the Act the local authority, in contradistinction to the tribunal, have no powers to demand information in relation to the tenancy agreements and necessarily may be in a position where all the material facts cannot be known to them. It is of course conceded that the local authority must act bona fide. It is not here suggested that there has been any mala fides on the part of the local authority. Moreover, I consider that it is implicit in this Act that when the local authority make a reference to the tribunal they shall not act frivolously or vexatiously. In my judgment, unless the landlords can show either mala fides or that the council acted frivolously or vexatiously it is impossible to say that the council in referring the matter to the rent tribunal were acting ultra vires.

e I do not think that it has been seriously suggested that what the council did was either frivolous or vexatious. The complaint made against them by counsel for the landlords in the course of his most persuasive argument was that they referred the matter to the tribunal without taking into account the views of the tenants or whether there was any real likelihood of the rents being reduced. Counsel further argued that the council wrongly took into account the landlords' refusal to allow inspection of certain premises which were not the subject-matter of the tenancy agreements in question. These tenancy agreements referred to 22 rooms in seven houses belonging to the landlords, each of which the landlords had let to a tenant. There are now, in effect, only 12 applications because the tenants have moved out of the rooms which were the subject-matter of the other ten tenancy agreements.

g The object of the legislature in giving the local authority the power to refer the tenancy agreements to the rent tribunal was clearly conferred so as to take care of cases in which tenants, perhaps of working class dwellings, were not in a position to look after themselves, or were afraid of making a reference to the tribunal. There are many districts—and Camden is apparently one—where there is a great shortage of reasonably priced working class dwellings, and a tenant who applied to the tribunal might well consider that if he offended the landlord by so doing he might find himself in the street or compelled to go and live in a district which was inconvenient for his purposes. I would not like to be understood as making any criticism of the landlords whatsoever. It is not for us to decide whether they are good or bad landlords. It is only fair to say that much of the evidence which was placed before the court went to show that they are good landlords. That, however, is not, as I say, the issue for us to consider.

In Camden there exists a body which calls itself Camden Housing Action. Again it is not for us to say whether this body performs a useful function. They have busied themselves with presenting arguments and facts to the council with a view to persuading the council to exercise the powers conferred on them by the 1968 Act. In the summer of 1970 they were urging the council to exercise its powers in relation to property belonging to the landlords and let to tenants. The council attempted to obtain information in relation to a number of properties belonging to the landlords by sending its valuation officers to make such enquiries as they could about the tenancy agreements and the premises to which they referred. The valuation officers succeeded in interviewing 22 tenants. These officers reported that they felt that the rents were a little high.

The matter, I think, was first considered by the council, or its housing committee, on 2nd July 1970. It came before the same committee again on 15th September when a report from the town clerk was considered. The town clerk reported what he had learned from the valuation officers. In that report the town clerk also referred to *R v Paddington and St Marylebone Rent Tribunal, ex parte Bell London and Provincial Properties Ltd*⁵, and suggested that the judgment of the Divisional Court in that case had rather stultified the effect of s 72 of the 1968 Act; his advice was that in the light of that case and the present circumstances, there would be little chance of success in respect of the complaints which were in substance that the rents were too high and that the accommodation was inadequate. Representatives from the Camden Housing Action Group attending that meeting of the committee advanced reasons for differing from the view expressed by the town clerk and urged the council to exercise its powers under s 72 on the basis that there was a real chance that the tribunal might reduce the rents in question.

At that meeting—which apparently lasted some time—the council adjourned the matter so that the opinion of counsel might be taken; and the opinion of counsel was taken. He advised, or expressed the hope, that the council should take action. The committee met again on 27th October and further considered the matter, and on 1st December, when they met again to consider the problem, counsel's opinion, or a resumé of counsel's opinion, was before them. The committee then decided to exercise their powers under s 72 and that decision of the committee was ratified by the council on 6th January. It is quite plain that there were some councillors who were against any action being taken, and there was an illuminating written report from Councillor Colin Jaque urging the council not to refer. I do not propose to read the report, but it really came to this, that in his opinion it would not be in the best interests of the tenants to refer the tenancy agreements in question.

It is quite obvious that the council did not act precipitately. Indeed, it is plain that the council went into this matter with the most meticulous care and, having considered all the matters before them, came to the conclusion that it would be right to refer the tenancy agreements in question to the tribunal. It is said that they did not take into account the tenants' views, but an affidavit has been sworn by Mr Kosky, the chief legal officer to the council, and according to his evidence he stated:

'At the meeting on the 15th September I summed up the feelings of the tenants as conveyed to the Valuation Officers, that the council would receive a measure of support from the tenants if it referred their contracts to the Rent Tribunal although some of them were against this and others who would support the action were not prepared to attend at the Rent Tribunal to say so. I knew these facts from seeing the Valuation Officers' notes of their interviews with the tenants.'

It is right to say that before the Divisional Court there were affidavits from the a tenants who said that they did not want their tenancy agreements referred, but those affidavits were not before the council. Three of the councillors have sworn affidavits to the effect that they have no recollection of the views of the tenants (which the legal adviser says he put before the council) having been brought to their attention. It may be they have no recollection, but there has been no application to cross-examine the legal adviser and no reason to suppose that what he stated in his affidavit is other than accurate.

b It is suggested that the council approached the problem that confronted them on the basis that the tenants were not making any complaint and, presumably, were not supporting a reference by the council. I do not think, however, that the powers of the council to refer can conceivably be inhibited by the fact that the tenants themselves do not want references to be made. The reasons why they do not want reference to be made are sometimes obscure and may be very difficult to discover. No doubt the wishes of the tenants are something which the council should bear in mind, but, even if the tenants are against references being made, there is nothing to prevent the council from taking a different view. I cannot think that there is any substance in the contention that the council came to their decision without taking the tenants' views into account. If Mr Kosky's affidavit is accepted—as I think it should be—obviously the tenants' views as reported by the valuation officers were taken into account. But even in the absence of any affidavit from Mr Kosky the council approached the case on the basis that the tenants were making no complaint and did not wish reference to be made. So whether the negative evidence of the three councillors to whom I referred is correct or whether the positive evidence in Mr Kosky's affidavit is correct, the council were taking the views of the tenants into consideration—although they may have misunderstood them.

e As far as the argument that the council did not consider whether there was any likelihood of the rents being reduced is concerned, in my judgment there is equally little substance in that contention. They had the opinion of the council's officers that the rents were a little too high, i.e. that they were a little higher than what would have been the reasonable rent. It would be for the tribunal to decide whether or not the rents in those circumstances should be reduced, and there would be nothing to prevent the tribunal from coming to a decision that they should be reduced. On the material before this court it seems to me that there was ample material on which the council could reasonably come to the conclusion that there was something for the tribunal to consider and a reasonable likelihood that it might reduce the rents.

f As to the allegation that they wrongly took into account the landlords' refusal to allow inspection of certain premises of the landlords, I am afraid that, in spite of the argument that has been addressed to us, I consider that this contention also is ill-founded. It is quite true that after the 22 tenants in question had been interviewed and it was discovered by the landlords that they had been interviewed, the landlords took steps to prevent the council's officers interviewing the tenants of the remaining houses about which a complaint had been made by the Camden Housing Action. This, of course, may have been out of consideration for the other tenants and to spare them the necessity of having to meet the council's officers and of being questioned about their tenancy agreements and their premises. On the other hand, I should have thought that the council were perfectly entitled to take the view that that might have been because the landlords were most unwilling for the council to be fully informed about the tenancies. It is a factor which might justifiably have strengthened the impression of those members of the council who thought there was something to refer to the tribunal. If the landlords had said to the council: 'We don't mind what enquiries you make; we are not at all nervous about our rents being thought to be too high, go ahead and get all the information you want'; that, I imagine, would have told in their favour. The fact that they were, apparently, unwilling that the council should be apprised of the facts is a point—not a very important point, but a point—which the council would be entitled to take into consideration in deciding whether or not there was a case to refer to the tribunal. I naturally agree that if the landlords could show, for example, that the council were referring the tenancy agreements to the tribunal out of spite because they disliked the landlords and did not genuinely believe that there was anything of substance in the information that the rents were too high, then that would have been an excess of power. It would also have been capricious and vexatious, and might well have come within the classification of being mala fides. But there is not any ground that I can discern on which the Divisional Court could have come to such a conclusion, and it clearly did not do so. Nor do I.

I recognise that when a reference is made by the council to the tribunal, although it is true that no decision has been taken against the landlords which affects their basic rights in the sense that I have indicated, it follows that they may be put to expense and inconvenience. Nevertheless, in my judgment, the landlords are given all the protection which is reasonably necessary if the Act requires, as in my view it does require, only that the council shall act bona fide and not make a decision capriciously or vexatiously. The assumption must be, until the contrary is proved—and the onus of proving the contrary is on the landlords—that the council did act properly. I cannot discern any evidence from which it would be possible to draw the inference that the council in this case acted other than properly, I do not mean by that in the slightest to influence the tribunal in the decision at which it arrives. The council may have come to a wrong conclusion. It may be that the tribunal will find that the rents are such that they ought not to be reduced. It may come to a different conclusion. It will not take the fact that the council have referred the rents as an indication that the rents are too high, any more than it would take into consideration the fact that the landlords have thought it worth spending the money involved in going to the Divisional Court and coming to this court as an indication that the landlords wish to prevent the tribunal from considering these tenancy agreements because they recognise that the rents are too high.

Before I part with the case it is important that I should refer to *R v Paddington and St Marylebone Rent Tribunal, ex parte Bell London and Provincial Properties Ltd*⁶. This decision turned on its own very special facts. If, as has been suggested, this decision has inhibited councils from referring cases in which they considered that there was a reasonable prospect of the tribunal reducing the rent, then it can only be because *Bell's case*⁶ has been misunderstood. That case concerned a large block of flats of which Lord Goddard CJ said that the tenants enjoyed all the amenities usually afforded in high class blocks of flats in the West End of London and were people well able to look after themselves: a very different class of accommodation and a very different type of tenant from the accommodation and the tenants with which we are concerned. In that case the council in question had referred 302 tenancy agreements to the rent tribunal merely because the rent tribunal had reduced the rents of two flats in this block. The decision is correctly set out in the headnote in this way⁷:

... the method of reference adopted by the local authority indicating, as it did, that no investigation or inquiry could have been made by them into the nature of the contracts of tenancy referred by them to the tribunal, did not constitute a valid and bona fide exercise by the local authority of the powers conferred on them by Parliament. It was never intended by the Act⁸ that a local authority should refer cases of contracts in respect of which they had neither received a complaint from the tenant, nor had themselves made any inquiry to see whether there was a prima facie case or anything to indicate that there was any unfairness in the rent charged.⁹

a The present case is entirely different, not only because we are dealing with a different class of property and a different type of tenant, but because in this case there was an investigation and a careful investigation, and enquiry by the council into the relevant facts. Indeed, one of the complaints made by the landlords is that the council made too many enquiries, not that they made none. Lord Goddard CJ said⁹:

b 'No doubt, the reason why it was provided that cases might be referred by a local authority was because it was recognised that there might be tenants who would hesitate themselves to refer the case for fear of the consequences that might befall them, but it could never have been intended that local authorities could refer cases respecting which they had neither received complaint from the tenant nor had made any inquiry whether there was a prima facie case . . . The borough council in question have decided as a matter of policy that in the case of c any property in respect of which two or more reductions in rent had been made, all the contracts of letting to which the Act applied relating to such property should be referred to the tribunal.'

d Then he said this, which points the difference—or one of the many differences—between that case and the present⁹:

e 'This may be a perfectly proper course to take in respect of certain cases, as, for instance, one or two houses [and he might have said even seven] in the same ownership all of which are let out in separate tenements to poor or working class persons, but to apply this policy to 555 flats without any inquiry, or, indeed, knowledge, whether the Act applies or not is an entirely different matter.'

He goes on to point out that any other view might lead to the conclusion that the council without any information or enquiry as to the tenancies in question could refer all the flats within their jurisdiction to the rent tribunal, which would clearly be highly inconvenient for the landlords and equally inconvenient for the tribunal.

Lord Goddard CJ also said¹⁰:

f 'In our opinion, the action of the borough council in referring the whole of these flats in the manner they have done is not a genuine exercise of the powers conferred on them by the Act, and we cannot refrain from saying that it is regrettable that in the form of reference information purports to be given to the tribunal which is quite inaccurate and has been given without the slightest attempt to see that it was accurate.'

g In the present case the fullest information was given to the council. The size of the room let—and they were all very small—the number of persons occupying each room, the rent, and the condition of the premises, the standard of furnishing and the facilities were all given. In the great majority of cases, these were assessed as fair to poor. So obviously the most careful enquiries had been made. It is not suggested that h any of the information contained in the references is wrong. This case is entirely different from Bell's case¹¹.

i There are two sentences in the judgment of Lord Goddard CJ that have been seized on. The first sentence is⁹: 'It was never intended that this Act should provide for general rent fixing throughout a district.' That, of course, is correct, and if all the flats in a district could be referred to the rent tribunal by the council without making j any enquiry, it might be said that the council were being used as a general rent fixing tribunal, but nothing of the kind happened here. The second sentence is⁹:

'[It] is to deal with individual cases where hardship exists or may be reasonably supposed to exist.' Those words could, perhaps, be given a very wide meaning. I think, however, that all that Lord Goddard CJ intended to lay down was that if the council referred tenancy agreements to the tribunal in circumstances in which no reasonable council could have done so, then the council were acting ultra vires. In that particular case no reasonable council could have properly referred the tenancy agreements to the tribunal, having made no enquiry about them. It seems to me that it is of paramount importance that the decision in the Bell case¹²—which, if I may respectfully say so, was clearly a correct decision on its facts—should be applied only to special facts similar to those which existed in that case. The decision should not be extended or understood so as to inhibit a council from referring tenancy agreements to the tribunal in circumstances such as exist in the present case.

For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal.

EDMUND DAVIES LJ. It is generally agreed that the vast majority of members of local authorities perform without fear or favour tasks in the public service, yet experience shows that they receive as a result more brick-bats than bouquets. It is frequently insufficiently recognised that without their voluntary service local government as we know it in this country would be impossible. That is but one of the many reasons why, as I think, adopting the words of Lord Reading in *R v Brighton Corpn, ex parte Thomas Tilling Ltd*¹³, the court ought to be very slow in interfering with their decisions.

Here we are concerned with the manner in which Camden Borough Council have applied s 72 of the Rent Act 1968, which empowers them to refer, in appropriate cases, contracts of furnished lettings to a rent tribunal. The prime question involved is: since prohibition of the reference in 22 contracts is sought by the landlords, what test should be applied in considering whether or not the references were right and proper?

*R v Paddington and St Marylebone Rent Tribunal, ex parte Bell London and Provincial Properties Ltd*¹², is, as Salmon LJ has already said, widely different in its facts from the present case. But, properly understood, I think there is nothing in the decision of Lord Goddard CJ which should inhibit local authorities from taking steps, in circumstances which appear to them proper, from referring furnished letting contracts to the statutory body. For the test which Lord Goddard CJ enunciated was¹⁴:

'In considering whether there has been a valid reference by the local authority, it is necessary, in our opinion, to consider whether on the facts of this case there has been a valid and bona fide exercise of the powers conferred by Parliament on them.'

The question has been canvassed whether the test enunciated in *Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corpn*¹⁵ by Lord Greene MR is appropriate to cases such as the present. For my part, I would think, having regard to the limited powers of a local authority to glean relevant information under the Rent Acts, that it would be imposing on them a hardship which they ought not properly to bear if a reference which they had conscientiously and bona fide made could be impeached simply by pointing out that they appeared to have taken into consideration a factor which was not properly relevant, or that they had omitted to take into consideration every relevant factor. Certainly the failure to have regard to proper circumstances and the fact that improper considerations were taken into mind may help those who attack the decision of the council along the road towards the goal that they have to a attain; but the fact that the council may conceivably, in the judgment of some, or indeed all, have paid some attention to a factor which is not strictly relevant ought not, in my judgment, to be ipso facto sufficient to enable a reference made by them in a case such as the present to be prohibited.

b The reason I think that the strict Wednesbury approach¹⁶ would be a hardship is that, while the local authority have to do the best they can to glean information relating to furnished lettings, their ability to gain it is limited and quite unassisted by the statute. Once a reference has been made to the tribunal, on the other hand, it is vested with a power, under s 72 (2) of the Act, to obtain a great deal of information essential to enable it to come to its determination in the particular case. I look, for example, at the statutory form which is to be found in Sch 1 to the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Regulations 1946¹⁷, headed 'Particulars concerning which lessors may by notice be required to give information', and there are not less than 11 paragraphs of particulars which should furnish the tribunal with the sort of information necessary to come to a decision. I repeat that the local authority have no such power to glean information and they have to do the best they can. It may come from a variety of sources. It may come from the tenants themselves, and, indeed, as Lord Goddard CJ said in the Bell case¹⁸, the wishes of the tenants surely ought at least to be taken into account. They may gain some information from outside bodies. They must, of course, be careful not to act on gossip or rumour which may be maliciously inspired or honestly mistaken. In most cases one would hope that a landlord, on being approached, would co-operate with them in his own interest and give the information they were seeking, although there is no shadow of doubt he is under no obligation to co-operate in any way.

e Like Salmon LJ, I think that the proper test to apply is whether or not in resolving to refer a Part VI contract to the rent tribunal there are grounds for concluding that the council were actuated by mala fides or were acting capriciously or vexatiously. As I have already said, in considering that matter the demonstration (if such be forthcoming) that they have taken irrelevant matters into consideration or omitted relevant factors may be of the greatest assistance, but that latter aspect is not conclusive. Nevertheless, out of respect to the able and helpful submissions of counsel f for the landlords, I feel that I too should make quite short comments on the four matters falling into two groups which counsel relied on as showing that the Wednesbury test¹⁶, if applied to this case, ought to result in prohibition being granted.

g He said that the council failed in two respects. They failed to take into account the views of the tenants. I have already adverted to Lord Goddard CJ's observation in the Bell case¹⁹ that they ought surely to be taken into consideration. Well, the exact position in relation to that matter is, I think, obscure on the conflicting affidavits and it is impossible for this court to resolve such conflict as existed. But I think and hope that I am right in concluding that, putting it at its lowest, most members of the council's housing committee must have been aware of the fact that very few, if any, of the tenants of the 22 Part VI contracts with which we are concerned wanted a reference at all. Accordingly, I do not think that that first ground h of complaint urged by counsel for the landlords is established, and established it, like all other complaints, must be by the applicants. For at the end of the day it is for them to satisfy the court that the council have acted in a manner which ought to be impeached.

j The second factor which it was urged should have been taken into consideration by the council and was in fact ignored was that in the circumstances obtaining it was unlikely, to put it at its highest, that any of these 22 references to the rent tribunal would result in a reduction in the rent. Well, I do not know what is to be said about the action taken by Mr Kosky, the chief legal officer to the council, and the town clerk. One thing that is quite clear is that the town clerk conveyed to the housing committee, in unmistakable terms, the view formed by Mr Kosky that the prospects of success were extremely tenuous. But even though that view was expressed, that is by no means the end of the matter. Certainly that is a relevant factor in considering whether a council acted capriciously or vexatiously, but there may still be circumstances where the public weal requires that when, for example, rumours are going about, the air should be clarified by a reference to a tribunal which can establish in an authoritative manner where the truth lies. a

Counsel for the landlords went on to say that the council wrongly took into consideration at least two classes of irrelevant matters. First, that they were actuated by resentment of the landlords refusing inspection of premises other than the 22 furnished dwellings which were the subject-matter of the references. I know it is said by Mr Frey in one of his memoranda (and doubtless with a determination to express as best he could his view of what happened) that in his belief the hostility or irritation so engendered was, as it were, a turning point in the ultimate decision formed by the council. But other views are expressed and, like Salmon LJ, I am not satisfied that this council in the last resort did not act responsibly, despite the action of the landlords which, although wholly understandable, may perhaps in all the circumstances have been a little unwise. But they must not think that by this observation I am criticising them in any respect, for we do not know all the facts. There is a faint suggestion that the council's officers did not act as courteously as they might have done. I do not know the truth about that either. There may be a number of reasons why the landlords took the attitude they did, but in the last resort I am not satisfied that this in turn influenced the decision of the council to refer. b

It is lastly said by counsel for the landlords that the council wrongly allowed themselves to be influenced by the persistent and sustained pressure of the small body of, I think, six persons known as Camden Housing Action, who had expressed quite strongly worded views critical of the Part VI contracts in respect of which the landlords were the lessors. That the housing committee were impressed by the activities of that group Lord Widgery CJ thought beyond question, for in the course of his judgment he said²⁰: c

'As a result of this pressure—and it seems to me there is no doubt it was as a result—the housing committee of Camden decided to make investigations of the terms of letting in the houses with which Messrs Frey were associated.' d

For my part I am quite prepared to accept this view expressed by Lord Widgery CJ, but who is to say that it is wrong for a council to allow their determination to be affected by the view expressed—it may be persistently and vociferously and strongly—by a pressure group? Is that enough of itself to indicate that the council are allowing themselves to be overborne and persuaded to make a decision which is mala fide or vexatious or capricious? Answering the question I have myself posed, I would have thought it must depend on what the action group say and how they say it, and, insofar as their assertion could be tested, the extent to which it appeared to have some foundation? If it was manifestly baseless, if there were suspicion of some ulterior motive, be it financial or political or inspired solely by personal aggrandisement, then of course the council should dismiss it from their minds. But if what was said by the action group provided food for thought, and if it appeared to have at least some reasonable degree of support, for my part I reject the idea that it would be improper to be influenced by what the action group said. In this particular case and in relation to this particular pressure group, I am not satisfied that the council, when (as I am prepared to accept) they were impressed by what they said, were thereby led into doing something which they ought not to do. e a Despite the lack of anything like an amplitude of knowledge on the part of the council, there was, in my judgment, sufficient material to enable them to arrive at the conscientious conclusion, uninfluenced by any unworthy considerations, that these references should be made. Unlike Bell's case²¹, they had information of the size of rooms, of rents, and they had particulars of the extent of the furnishings. They had the view expressed by those who had visited the premises that the rents were a little high. They had their own knowledge of the pressing need of furnished accommodation in the district. When all those matters are considered in combination, as I take it the housing committee considered them, and when I ask myself the question, 'In the light of all that material, is it established that they acted capriciously or vexatiously?'—for lack of bona fides is expressly disclaimed by counsel for the landlords—the answer to which I am driven is that it is not so established.

c I assiduously refrain from hinting at even the approach to the outline of a shadow of an idea as to what I think ought to be, or probably will be, the conclusion of the rent tribunal in any one of these 22 cases, but that the statutory body should have an opportunity to adjudicate on this matter of considerable public interest I have no doubt. For those reasons, I concur with Salmon LJ in holding that this appeal should be refused.

d STAMP LJ. I reach the same conclusion by a somewhat different route. Were the matter untouched by authority I would take the view that just as s 72 of the Rent Act 1968 plainly confers an unrestricted right on the tenant and landlord to refer a tenancy agreement to the rent tribunal, so it confers an unrestricted right on the local authority to do so; and a right which the council, as the housing authority, had a duty, in a proper case, to exercise. One may search the Act in vain to find any condition or provision which fetters or limits the council's action in this regard. It is to be observed that all that is done when resort is had to s 72 is to refer to the competent statutory body the fixing of the rent. I would have thought it wrong in principle for the High Court, on an application for an order of prohibition to prevent the council from referring a rent or rents to the appropriate statutory tribunal, to go into the merits of the decision to refer; for if the reference is without merit it must be assumed that the rent tribunal will take no action on it. In determining whether or not to invoke the section the council are in no sense exercising a judicial function and they are not even, as I see it, exercising such a discretion as a licensing authority exercise, or as a local authority exercise in relation to Acts such as the Town and Country Planning Act or as has to be exercised in determining whether to make a compulsory acquisition.

g In my view, such cases as *Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corp*¹ are different sorts of cases. In cases such as those the authority in reaching a decision have to weigh, and have an obvious duty to weigh, one thing against the other, and there is a body of legislation guiding them in the performance of their powers or duties. Here there is no such body of legislation and, as I have said, I find nothing in the Rent Act 1968 which suggests to me that the council have any duty to the landlords in determining whether to exercise their right to refer or not.

h If, therefore, the matter was res integra, I would myself take the view that in the absence of any allegation that the council had been acting ultra vires or mala fide, the present proceedings were misconceived and failed in limine. Reliance, however, was placed on the decision of the Divisional Court in Bell's case²⁰, which has already been referred to by Salmon and Edmund Davies LJ. So far as the decision in that case rested on the view that the local authority there were not acting bona fide, it is, so I will assume without expressing an opinion, perhaps not open to criticism; but I cannot accept, as appears to be suggested in a part of the judgment heavily relied on by the landlords in this case, that the court has a general power to examine the proceedings of local authorities to see whether in coming to a purely administrative decision not affecting rights they have taken into account all those factors which ought to be taken into account in order to arrive at a wise or correct decision. The authorities cited by the court in *Bell's case*² in support of the general proposition that the court can interfere with the exercise of powers by local authorities were *Biddulph v St George's, Hanover Square*³, and *Dormer v Newcastle-upon-Tyne Corpn*⁴. In both of those cases the plaintiff was complaining that the action of the defendants constituted a tort, and read in that context the dicta in those cases relied on by the court in *Bell's case*² do not, in my judgment, support the general proposition. Manifestly there can be no general rule that the court can in any case, and on the application of whomsoever, interfere with the exercise of the local authority's powers. As is pointed out in Professor de Smith's *Judicial Review of Administrative Actions*⁵, the administrative process is not, and cannot be, a succession of justiciable controversies. Public authorities are set up to govern and administer and if their every act or decision were to be reviewable by a judicial body the business of administration could be brought to a standstill. Aliter if the act or decision affects a right.

There being no evidence in this case that the council acted ultra vires or dishonestly, so that that situation does not fall to be considered, I would not enter into the question of whether they did or did not make mistakes in coming to the conclusion to refer to the tribunal the tenancy agreements here in question. I too would dismiss the appeal.

Ronald Bernstein QC. My Lord, if I may be allowed to mention one point in my argument which none of your Lordships has mentioned, and that is that in the circumstances shown in the additional affidavits which your Lordships gave me leave to read, in fact the authority did not consider each of the 22 cases separately but considered them as a block and made a block reference. If I may say so with respect, that point is in effect comprised within Stamp LJ's judgment, but not within the judgments of Salmon and Edmund Davies LJ.

SALMON LJ. Thank you Mr Bernstein for drawing our attention to it, but I thought it followed from what I said—at least I intended it to—that to my mind it is not established that this was a block reference within the meaning of 'block reference' as used in *Bell's case*². The details of each particular tenancy were before the council and, although they may not have voted on each case separately, I do not think it follows that that is a block reference.

EDMUND DAVIES LJ. I too am sorry that I wholly failed to carry out my intention of dealing with the important point of counsel for the landlords that here there was a block reference and that, in accordance with *Bell's case*², this was a wrong thing to do. Like Salmon LJ I had it clearly in mind, for I also thought that the council, with the material before them, must have separately considered each of the cases. I do not accept any proposition to the effect that unless they severally announce a decision in respect of each of the cases in turn but reserve the announcement of their conclusion until they have considered all of them, a block reference such as that condemned in *Bell's case*⁶ is the result. Had I done what I intended, that is what I would have said.

STAMP LJ. And I would have agreed with Salmon and Edmund Davies LJ.

- b Arbitration – Practice – Want of prosecution – Dismissal of claim – Power of arbitrator to dismiss claim for want of prosecution – Prolonged and unwarranted delay by claimants to prosecute claim – No failure by claimants to comply with order of arbitrator to take interlocutory step before a given date.

A firm of builders constructed a house for the claimants pursuant to a contract containing an arbitration clause in common form. The claimants complained that the work was defective and in 1966 an arbitrator was appointed. Requests were made by the builders' solicitors for particulars of the damage claimed but without success. In November 1970 the builders applied to the arbitrator to strike out the proceedings and dismiss the claim for want of prosecution. The arbitrator found that there had been prolonged and unwarranted delay in the prosecution of the arbitration wholly or mainly caused by the claimants, but he declined to strike out. On a special case stated for the court to determine whether the arbitrator should or should not strike out the proceedings and dismiss for want of prosecution,

- c Held – In the absence of any default on the part of the claimants in complying with an order to take some interlocutory step by a given date, the arbitrator had no power to dismiss the claim for want of prosecution, for in arbitration proceedings it was for both parties, having agreed that the arbitrator should resolve their differences, to obtain such interlocutory directions as were appropriate to enable the matter to be prepared for trial; accordingly it was not within an arbitrator's jurisdiction to order that the claim be dismissed for a mere delay on the part of the claimants independently of any failure to comply with an order made by the arbitrator (see p 1203 j to p 1204 a c and j, post).

- h This was a special case stated for the decision of the High Court pursuant to s 21 (1) (a) of the Arbitration Act 1950 by the arbitrator (George Fairweather Esq) on a question of law which arose in the course of the reference of a dispute between Anthony Davenport Crawford and Jean Margaret Crawford ('the claimants') and A E A Prowting Ltd ('the builders').

- i The arbitrator found the following facts. The dispute arose out of a building contract to erect a dwelling-house for the claimants. The work provided for by the contract was completed by the builders in December 1960. The letter before action was dated 4th June 1965. The arbitrator was appointed on 5th April 1966. The points of the claim were served on 17th May 1966. The lists of documents were exchanged by 17th October 1966. In spite of repeated promises to do so, the claimants' solicitors failed to provide to the builders' solicitors particulars of the damage claimed, to which the builders were plainly entitled. These particulars were first requested by the builders' solicitors on 29th March 1967 and were repeatedly requested thereafter. On 10th January 1968, at an appointment for directions, the arbitrator made no order and it was left to the parties to arrange a fresh appointment to fix a date for the hearing. Neither party arranged a fresh appointment for this purpose and no date was fixed. Between 10th January 1968 and 10th November 1970 no steps whatever were taken in the arbitration except by the builders who on 10th November 1970 applied to the arbitrator to strike out the proceedings and dismiss the claim for want of prosecution. There was prolonged and unwarranted delay in the prosecution of the arbitration from 17th October 1966 to 10th November 1970 when the arbitrator heard the builders' application. This delay was wholly or in the main caused by the claimants. The builders alleged that their position had been seriously prejudiced in the conduct of their defence to the claim by the delay in proceeding to arbitration.

The builders contended before the arbitrator that he ought, following the principles laid down in Allen v Sir Alfred McAlpine & Sons Ltd^a and other authorities, to strike out and dismiss the claim for want of prosecution, but the arbitrator declined to do so. The question for the decision of the court was whether or not the arbitrator should have struck out the proceedings and dismissed the claim for want of prosecution.

BRIDGE J. These proceedings take the form of an application to the court to determine a question of law raised by a special case stated by an arbitrator pursuant to s 21 of the Arbitration Act 1950. The matter arises in this way. In 1960 the present applicants to the court, that is, A E A Prowting Ltd ('the builders'), who are building contractors, entered into an agreement with Mr and Mrs Crawford, the respondents in this court, claimants in the arbitration, to build a house for them. They built a house and after it was built complaints were made by the claimants that the work had been defectively done. The contract under which the house had been built contained an arbitration clause. Although this does not appear from the case stated, I have been shown the document. It is an arbitration clause in common form referring to arbitration any dispute or difference arising between the parties touching and concerning the agreement, which was the building contract. Nothing turns on its particular provisions.

After the dispute arose the arbitrator was appointed in April 1966. The points of claim were served in May. Lists of documents were exchanged in October. Then the case finds that there were repeated requests by the builders' solicitors for particulars from the claimants of the damage claimed, and although such particulars were promised, they were never given. Apart from correspondence passing in relation to that matter, nothing appears to have been done by either party following the exchange of documents until 10th January 1968, when there was an appointment for directions before the arbitrator who (and I quote from the case) 'made no order and it was left to the parties to arrange a fresh appointment to fix a date for the hearing'.

Neither party arranged a fresh appointment for this purpose and no date was fixed. The next thing that happened was that on 10th November 1970 the builders applied to the arbitrator to strike out the proceedings and dismiss the claim for want of prosecution. This the arbitrator declined to do, and it is because the builders are aggrieved at his refusal to accede to their application to dismiss the claim for want of prosecution that they bring the matter before this court.

a Now apart from the bare outline of the history of the proceedings which I have related, the only finding of fact in the case relevant to the question whether or not it would have been proper to dismiss the claim for want of prosecution is a statement that there was prolonged and unwarranted delay in the prosecution of the arbitration from 17th October 1966 (which, it will be remembered, was the date when documents were exchanged) to 10th November 1970 (the date of the hearing of the application to dismiss) and that this delay was wholly or in the main caused by the claimants.

b As regards prejudice to the builders, the case contains a paragraph in these terms:

‘The [builders] say that their position has been seriously prejudiced in the conduct of their defence to the Claim by the delay in proceeding to arbitration.’

The question for the decision of the court is expressed as:

c ‘... whether or not I ought to strike out the proceedings and dismiss the claim for want of prosecution.’

It is at once apparent from those features of the case stated, as counsel for the builders was the first to recognise in opening his case before me, that the case does not embody any question of law in a form which he could possibly ask the court to decide d on the factual materials contained within the case. Accordingly, the most he can invite me to do, and what he does invite me to do, is to remit the matter to the arbitrator, requiring him to make a finding one way or the other whether or not the builders have been prejudiced by the delay which has occurred in their defence to the claim, and I think he would say also, to indicate, if his decision not to dismiss the claim was a purported exercise of discretion, the basis on which he thought it proper, e having regard to the prolonged and unwarranted delay, and prejudice (if he finds there was prejudice), to exercise discretion in the builders’ favour.

Now it appears that when the matter was argued before the arbitrator on the hearing of the builders’ application no submission was made to him to the effect that in the circumstances there was no power available to him to dismiss for want of prosecution. That submission was, however, made at a later stage when the parties

f appeared before the arbitrator to argue the question whether or not he should state a case. I suppose it is conceivable, although it seems unlikely, that the arbitrator’s decision might have been based on a view of his own that he had no power, but certainly the language of the case does not suggest that. Nevertheless, the main ground on which counsel for the claimants resists the application that this case stated should be remitted to the arbitrator by the court for a further and better statement of the g case, is that, as he says, there is in any event no power in an arbitrator in such circumstances as these, no express power to that effect having been conferred on him by the arbitration agreement, to dismiss a claim for want of prosecution. Accordingly, it would be futile to remit the case to the arbitrator seeking to discover the basis of facts on which he exercised his discretion if in truth he had no discretion to exercise but was bound as a matter of law and as a matter of jurisdiction to dismiss the h builders’ application.

It is common ground that the power to dismiss for want of prosecution is not found expressly in the terms of the arbitration agreement, nor can it be collected from any provision of the Arbitration Act 1950. I have been referred to the provisions in particular of s 12 of that Act which embodies a relatively elaborate code embracing what one may call the ancillary and interlocutory powers of arbitrators amplified

j by s 12(6) of that section. One of the most important provisions of s 12 which I bear in mind throughout is that:

‘(1) Unless a contrary intention is expressed [in the arbitration agreement], every ... agreement shall ... be deemed to contain a provision that the parties to the reference ... shall ... do all other things [other, that is, than matters specifically enumerated earlier in the subsection] which during the proceedings on the reference the arbitrator or umpire may require.' a

The arbitrator, therefore, is put fairly and squarely in a position to control, as regards the interlocutory steps, the conduct of an arbitration.

Now the submission of counsel for the builders rests first on a number of passages from the well-known decision of the Court of Appeal in *Allen v Sir Alfred McAlpine & Sons Ltd*¹, the locus classicus as to the principles which govern the exercise by the court of its undoubted power to dismiss for want of prosecution any proceedings in court. Those principles are well known. It is also well known that the primary foundation for the exercise of the court's jurisdiction to dismiss for want of prosecution is a default on the part of a plaintiff in complying with one or more of the numerous rules of court which at different stages in the process of litigation put an obligation fairly and squarely on the plaintiff and on the plaintiff alone to take the next step, and to take it in due time, which is necessary to secure the progress of the litigation. But counsel for the builders submits that the jurisdiction of the court does not depend on a default in compliance with the rules alone; there is also an inherent jurisdiction in the courts to act where there has been unreasonable delay on the part of the plaintiff even though not involving any specific default under the rules. The submission is, I think, well founded. It can be gathered by considering first a short passage from the argument of counsel who appeared for the first defendants in one of the three actions which were before the court on that occasion. He submitted in terms² 'This is not a case where one could proceed for breach of any one express rule'; but he argued: b

'The court can act under its inherent jurisdiction notwithstanding that there has been no breach of any express rule where it is satisfied that there has been excessive delay...'

Then there is a passage from the judgment of Lord Denning MR³, which I need not read, which shows what was the particular delay in that case on which counsel for the first defendants relied, not involving any specific breach of rule, which was nevertheless held to be such a delay as gave a good ground for exercising the court's jurisdiction. Finally, there is a passage from the judgment of Salmon LJ which deals with the matter in terms, where he says⁴: c

'A defendant may apply to have an action dismissed for want of prosecution either (a) because of the plaintiff's failure to comply with the Rules of the Supreme Court or (b) under the court's inherent jurisdiction. In my view it matters not whether the application comes under limb (a) or (b), the same principles apply.'

Then there follows Salmon LJ's well-known statement of what those principles are. d

The next step in counsel's argument is to draw attention to a passage from a decision of the Divisional Court in *Re Crighton and The Law Car & General Insurance Corpn Ltd*⁵ where Scrutton J said: e

'A dispute or difference having arisen, a member of the Bar was appointed arbitrator, and he ordered the parties to define the difference by delivering to each other points of claim and defence. In my view he had a right to do that, both by his inherent powers as a judicial officer and under s. 2 coupled with the First Schedule, clause f, of the Arbitration Act, 1889.'

a So it is submitted the court has an inherent power, for delay independently of default under the rules on the part of a plaintiff, to dismiss an action for want of prosecution when there has been inordinate and inexcusable delay on the plaintiff's part causing prejudice to the defendant; so by parity of reasoning, since an arbitrator has inherent power as a judicial officer, at all events, to do all such things as are necessary to the proper conduct of the litigation before him and as do not require the intervention of the court with its wider powers, accordingly, an arbitrator must be taken to have
b inherent power to dismiss for want of prosecution a claim in an arbitration made by a claimant. It is put on this basis, that one of the fundamental duties of an arbitrator is to act fairly and if there has been inordinate and inexcusable delay on the part of a claimant, such that the respondent to the claim in the arbitration is seriously prejudiced in his defence, then unless one supposes that the arbitrator has the inherent c power contended for, there is no means whereby he can act fairly because it must be unfair for him to permit a claim in the arbitration to proceed at a time when by the claimant's delay the respondent is seriously prejudiced in his defence to it.

Now this, if I may say so, seems to me to be a very powerful argument, but in the end I reject it and I reject it basically for one reason. Its validity rests on the assumption that in an arbitration, as in proceedings in court, and apart from any express
d obligation being put on him, there is a duty on the claimant to the exclusion of the respondent to promote the progress of the arbitration and correspondingly it is assumed as the basis of counsel for the builders' argument, that the respondent to the arbitration can sit by and do nothing, letting the sleeping claimant dog lie until he is ready to wake him up with his application to dismiss for want of prosecution. In support of the contention that I should assume that in this respect an arbitration
e stands on all fours with an action in the courts, counsel for the builders has relied particularly on a passage, again from *Allen's case*⁶, this time from the judgment of Diplock LJ, where, having referred to particular features of litigation, his Lordship continued⁷:

f 'It is thus inherent in an adversary system which relies exclusively on the parties to an action to take whatever procedural steps appear to them to be expedient to advance their own case, that the defendant, instead of spurring the plaintiff to proceed to trial, can with propriety wait until he can successfully apply to the court to dismiss the plaintiff's action for want of prosecution on the ground that so long a time has elapsed since the events alleged to constitute the cause of action that there is a substantial risk that a fair trial of the issues will not be possible.'

g For my part, I do not believe that their Lordships in *Allen's case*⁶ ever had the conduct of arbitrations in contemplation; and once one considers the position it does seem to me that there is a fundamental difference between the nature of the duties on the parties in relation to interlocutory progress in an action on the one hand and in an arbitration on the other. Even though it be right to say that this power when exercised by the court may be exercised because of delay as such on the part of a plaintiff
h independently of his default under the rules, the whole pattern of behaviour in litigation in court is conditioned by the pattern which the rules lay down, and it must be primarily from those rules that the position arises that the onus is put fairly and squarely on the plaintiff to keep the litigation moving. It must be primarily from those rules, although not necessarily exclusively, that the defendant derives his j relatively privileged position of being able to sit back and do nothing and then, if such a long time has elapsed that he is prejudiced thereby, to come along and secure the dismissal of the action. But it is essentially different, to my mind, in an arbitration when, although in a sense there may be a heavier duty on the claimant to pursue his claim than on the respondent to take steps for his part, nevertheless it is for both parties, having agreed that the arbitrator shall resolve their differences, to obtain from the arbitrator such interlocutory directions as are appropriate to enable the matter to be prepared for trial. I am particularly impressed, although my decision is one of principle, by the facts stated here which illustrate well the foundation for the principle. The parties came before the arbitrator for directions in the ordinary way in January 1968; no directions were given. One does not know why, but if the builders had wanted directions to be given at that stage, they could have pressed for them and, it may be, got them, and again it accords with one's common experience and recollection of how an arbitration is conducted that after that appointment it was left to the parties—not to the claimants but to the parties—to arrange a fresh appointment to fix a date for hearing, and no such appointment was ever suggested by either party. a

It seems to me that in that state of affairs, this being an ordinary arbitration where interlocutory obligations could only arise from specific orders made by the arbitrator, it was not within the arbitrator's jurisdiction for a mere delay on the part of the claimants independently of any failure to comply with an order made by the arbitrator to order that the claimants' claim be dismissed. c

It is unnecessary for me to go further and reach a conclusion as to what would be the position arising if there had been a default in such compliance and what would be the sanction available to an arbitrator to enforce compliance with his interlocutory orders. Counsel for the claimants has drawn my attention to a passage from Russell on Arbitration⁸, where it is stated that 'Every arbitrator is authorised, by the nature of his office, to proceed ex parte for good cause'. And authority is referred to in support of that in an old case of *Wood v Leake*⁹, where Lord Erskine LC giving judgment observed: d

'. . . every arbitrator had the power to proceed ex parte; if one of the parties, though duly summoned, will not attend, with a view to prevent justice, and defeat the object of the reference. The arbitrator is to judge of the discretion of it.'

It is suggested with force by counsel for the claimants here that that is the ultimate sanction whereby an arbitrator may effectively enforce compliance with his interlocutory orders or give an award against the party in default if the default persists. Counsel for the builders submits that that will not do in that if a claimant fails to comply with an order to particularise his claim adequately, it would be absurd to appoint a day for hearing and require the other party to come along with all his witnesses when he does not yet know what the claimant's claim is. I think there is force in that, but it seems to me the answer may well be (and it is unnecessary to decide it) that an arbitrator can require that some interlocutory step—the delivery of a pleading, for example—shall be taken by a certain date, intimating that failure on the claimant's part to take the step by that date will result in an ex parte hearing on that date which, in the absence of proper particularisation of the claimant's claim, would necessarily result in an award in favour of the respondent. That may be rather a cumbrous way of achieving the same effect as the courts achieve more directly by the exercise of their power to dismiss for want of prosecution. f

For the reasons I have sought to explain, I am not satisfied that, at all events in the absence of any default on the part of the claimants in complying with any order made by the arbitrator that they should take some interlocutory step by a given date, there is any power in the arbitrator to dismiss their claim. For those reasons, I have reached the conclusion that counsel for the claimants is right in submitting that it j a would be idle to remit this case to the arbitrator for further and better findings to elucidate the grounds on which he thought, assuming that he had a power, that his discretion should be exercised against using it.

Inland Revenue Commissioners v Helical Bar Ltd

LORD WILBERFORCE, VISCOUNT DILHORNE, LORD PEARSON, LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA AND LORD SALMON

1st, 2nd, 22nd MARCH 1972

d Income tax – Accounting period – Alteration of period of account of company – Decision and direction of Commissioners of Inland Revenue fixing periods of account – Appeal to Special Commissioners – Hardship – Power of Special Commissioners to grant such relief as just – Effects of alteration in accounting period – Double use of nine month period of profits in assessment to tax – Increase in liability to corporation tax – Income Tax Act 1952, s 127 (2) (b), (3), as amended by the Income Tax Management Act 1964, s 17 (3), Sch 4.

e The taxpayer company, which had previously made up its accounts to 31st January in each year, decided to change its accounting date to 30th April. The first new accounting period was 31st January 1964 to 30th April 1965. In consequence the Commissioners of Inland Revenue ('the board') made a decision under s 127 (2) (b)^a of the Income Tax Act 1952 (which was unappealable) that in respect of the year of assessment 1965-66 the company's basis period should be the year ending 30th April 1964. The board further decided, under s 127 (3), that the basis period for 1964-65 should be the year ending 30th April 1963. The taxpayer company appealed to the Special Commissioners against an assessment to income tax for 1964-65, the appeal

g '(1) Subject to the provisions of this and the three next following sections, tax shall be charged under Cases I and II of Schedule D on the full amount of the profits or gains of the year preceding the year of assessment.

h '(2) Where, in the case of the trade, profession or vocation, an account has or accounts have been made up to a date or dates within the period of three years immediately preceding the year of assessment—(a) if an account was made up to a date within the year preceding the year of assessment and that account was the only account made up to a date in that year and was for a period of one year beginning either at the commencement of the trade, profession or vocation, or at the end of the period on the profits or gains of which the assessment for the last preceding year of assessment was to be computed, the profits or gains of the year ending on that date shall be taken to be the profits or gains of the year preceding the year of assessment; (b) in any case to which the provisions of paragraph (a) do not apply, the Commissioners of Inland Revenue shall decide what period of twelve months ending on a date within the year preceding the year of assessment shall be deemed to be the year the profits or gains of which are to be taken to be the profits or gains of the year preceding the year of assessment.

j '(3) Where the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have given a decision under paragraph (b) of subsection (2) of this section and it appears to them that in consequence thereof the tax for the last preceding year of assessment in respect of the profits or gains from the same source should be computed on the profits or gains of a corresponding period, they may give directions to that effect and an assessment . . . or repayment of tax shall be made accordingly . . .'

being brought under s 127 (3) of the 1952 Act, as amended by s 17 (3)^b of, and Sch 4 to, the Income Tax Management Act 1964. The commissioners noted that the direction given under s 127 (3) of the 1952 Act as to the basis period for 1964-65 resulted in the basis periods for 1963-64 and 1964-65 overlapping by nine months (1st May 1962 to 31st January 1963) and that in consequence of the decision under s 127 (2) (b), the charge to corporation tax under the Finance Act 1965 became effective from 1st May 1964 rather than 31st January 1965 (the date on which the basis period for 1965-66 would have ended if the taxpayer company had not changed its accounting date). They stated that 'looking at the overlap in the light of the Board's decision relative to 1965-66' and the consequential charge to corporation tax from 1st May 1964 'the profits of the nine months' overlap were being in a real sense charged to tax twice over'. The commissioners held this to be unjust and therefore deducted £78,798 from the amount of the 1964-65 assessment, in effect reducing the overall amount of tax to which the taxpayer company was liable to that which would have been payable if the 1965-66 basis period had ended on 31st January 1965 and the charge to corporation tax had commenced from that date.

Held – The commissioners' decision was wrong in law and no basis had been shown for reducing the assessment; in granting 'such relief, if any, as is just' under Sch 4 to the 1964 Act, the commissioners had to consider whether there was any injustice in the assessment for 1964-65 and, if so, how it was to be relieved against; the double use of profits for 1st May 1962 to 31st January 1963 for two years of assessment could not in itself result in injustice; furthermore any hardship arising from the overlap in 1964-65 of corporation tax and income tax was inherent in the nature of the corporation tax itself and the taxpayer company was in no worse position than any other company whose 1965-66 basis period ended on 30th April 1964 rather than later; if the injustice lay, not in the date itself but the change to that date, this arose not from the board's determination under s 127 (3) but from the decision under s 127 (2) (b) which was unappealable; in either case the impact of corporation tax and its remoter consequences had no bearing on the justice or injustice of the assessment under appeal (see p 1208 e f and h and p 1209 c to j, post).

Decision of the Court of Appeal [1971] 2 All ER 447 reversed.

On an appeal by the taxpayer company against an assessment to income tax of £114,099 less capital allowances for the year 1964-65, b brought under the Income Tax Act 1952, s 127 (3), as amended by the Income Tax Act 1964, s 17 (3) and Sch 4, the Special Commissioners had held that £78,798 should be deducted from the profits of the taxpayer company assessable to income tax for that year. The facts are set out in the opinion of Lord Wilberforce.

d LORD WILBERFORCE. My Lords, this appeal concerns an assessment to income tax under Sch D, Case I, of the taxpayer company for 1964-65, which the Special Commissioners, on appeal by the company, acting under s 127 (3) of the Income Tax Act 1952, reduced by £78,798.

The taxpayer company, which previously made up its accounts to 31st January in each year, after 31st January 1964 changed its accounting date to 30th April. e The first new period was thus from 31st January 1964 to 30th April 1965. This brought into play s 127 (2) (b) of the Income Tax Act 1952, and under it the Commissioners of Inland Revenue decided that, in respect of the year of assessment 1965-66, the company's basis period should be the 12 months ending on 30th April 1964. The commissioners were not bound to select this period, but there is no doubt that they were entitled to do so and that their decision was unappealable. The commissioners f then proceeded, under s 127 (3) of the Act, to deal with the last preceding year of assessment, i e 1964-65. They determined that the basis period for this year of assessment should be the 12 months ending 30th April 1963. This determination was, indisputably, valid, but, under the terms of s 127 (3), as amended, an appeal lay to the Special Commissioners who may, under the subsection, grant such relief, if any, as may be just.

g The relevant figures are as follows:

1st February 1962 to 31st January 1963		104,867
1st February 1963 to 31st January 1964		141,203
1st February 1964 to 30th April 1965 (15 months)		95,654
h B. Tax assessments
1963-64 (measured on year to 31st January 1963)		104,867
1965-66 (measured on year to 30th April 1964)		125,033

i The relevant law is contained in s 127 (2) and (3) of the Income Tax Act 1952, the latter as amended by s 17 of, and Sch 4 to, the Income Tax Management Act 1964. It is necessary, in addition, to have regard to the Finance Act 1965, in particular ss 46 (1), 49 (3), 80 (2) and 87. The effect of the latter Act was that the company became liable, in addition to income tax in respect of the sums mentioned, to corporation tax as from 1st May 1964. This fell to be assessed on the actual profits for that period, and over a 12 month period amounted to tax on £76,523 (i.e. 12/15ths of £95,654 appearing above).

The Special Commissioners' decision: they noted, first, that the direction given as to the basis period for 1964-65 resulted in the basis periods for 1963-64 and 1964-65 overlapping by nine months, i.e. 1st May 1962 to 31st January 1963. (The apportioned profits for this period were some £78,000.) They then proceeded as follows:

'In the present case, looking at the overlap in the light of the circumstances of the Board's decision relative to 1965/66 and the consequential charge to Corporation Tax as from 1st May, 1964, we came to the conclusion that the profits of the nine months' overlap were being in a real sense charged to tax twice over, and this we considered was, in the particular circumstances, unjust. In all the circumstances it seemed to us that an appropriate way of relieving this injustice was to deduct £78,798 from the amount of the 1964/65 assessment.'

My Lords, I am unable to support the latter decision. Under s 127 (3) the commissioners, after they have decided, as they may or may not do, to fix a basis period different from the company's accounting period, have to make an assessment for the relevant year. The relevant year was 1964-65 and no other year. The appeal is formally against the decision to give the direction, but it is prescribed that if (as must be the case where a direction has been given) an assessment is made in accordance with the direction, the appeal against the decision is by way of an appeal against the assessment. Thus the appeal is against the assessment of £113,951. The reference to 'such relief, if any, as is just' shows that what the Special Commissioners have to consider is whether there is any injustice in the assessment and, if so, how it is to be relieved against.

Now, as appears from the figures given above, the assessment made by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue (£113,951) was in fact lower than that which would have been made if the company's original dates had stood (£141,203), but there can be no doubt that the Special Commissioners on appeal are not obliged to stop at this simple comparison. They may, indeed should, look at the assessments for other neighbouring periods (old and new) to see if there is any injustice, but the injustice, if any, must be in the assessment under enquiry. To illustrate: the Special Commissioners' practice is to take an average of the profits of several years (1) under the old system and (2) under the new, and if they find that the latter is significantly higher than the former (as it may be where there have been fluctuations in profits), they grant relief. The relief they grant is, and I would think almost necessarily must be, by way of reduction of the assessment in question; I cannot see how they can interfere with any other assessment not before them. I remark in passing that the result of the commissioners' decision is to take as the taxable profits for 1964-65 a sum of £35,000, which represents the profits for a period of three months.

I return to the Special Commissioners' decision and to the question whether they made any error in law.

It is clear, in the first place, that no injustice arises from the mere fact that there was a nine months' overlap, i.e. that some £78,000 of profits, those from 1st May 1962 to 31st January 1963, entered into two years' assessments. This double computation, or double use of profits for two years' assessments, is a phenomenon frequently found in income tax law: it may happen whenever there is a change of accounting period. Injustice can result if the doubly used profits are unusually high (not this case) but not from the double use itself. I need not elaborate on this because all four judges below agree that this fact alone cannot give rise to injustice.

a The factor which does, it is said, have this effect arises from the introduction of corporation tax. This is because, for the year beginning 1st April 1964, the profits of a company come into charge as from the end of the basis period for the purposes of income tax for the assessment year 1965-66. Thus, the earlier in the financial year a company's accounting year ends, the more of its profits are charged, so that this company suffered, to the extent of nine months, by its basis period being brought b back from 1st January 1965, to 1st May 1964. To this comparatively simple argument there was added another of more sophistication. The effect of the introduction of corporation tax was, it was said, to take away from the company the advantage it would otherwise have had at the end of its trading life—an advantage which would have caused the profits for a period to drop out of charge to income tax. Under the corporation tax system, this drop out does not occur. These two factors, taken c together, amounted, it was claimed, to an injustice which the Special Commissioners could properly relieve against.

My Lords, I find this claim fallacious. In the first place, any supposed hardship arising from the overlap in the financial year 1964-65 of corporation tax and income tax is inherent in the nature of that tax and is common in some degree to all trading companies. The courts cannot regard as an injustice that which merely flows from d the nature of a tax as devised by Parliament. Insofar as this company suffers from having its basis period end on 30th April 1964 (rather than later), it suffers in common with any other company with a similar basis date; there can hardly be injustice in denying it a relief which they cannot get. If, finally, the injustice lies not in the date itself, but in the change to that date, then it arises not from the determination of the commissioners under s 127 (3) (which related to the 12 months ending 30th April 1963, but from the decision of the commissioners under s 127 (2), fixing the terminal e date of 30th April 1964), which decision was unappealable. Whichever way the matter is regarded, the impact of corporation tax and its remoter consequences have no bearing on the justice or injustice of the assessment under appeal.

In my opinion, the Special Commissioners' decision, whether based on the nine months' overlap, or the earlier incidence of corporation tax, or on a combination of f these two, was wrong in law and there was no basis shown for reducing the assessment. I would allow the appeal.

VISCOUNT DILHORNE. My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce. I agree with it and there is nothing I wish to add.

g LORD PEARSON. My Lords, for the reasons given in the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce, I would allow the appeal.

LORD CROSS OF CHELSEA. My Lords, for the reasons given by my noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce, I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

h LORD SALMON. My Lords, for the reasons given in the opinion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Wilberforce, I would allow the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

The plaintiff ('Karak'), a company with a stock exchange quotation, ceased to trade in 1958. Karak had assets consisting of a sum of £120,000 with its bank ('Chartered') and £5,000 in tax reserve certificates. The board of Karak invited offers for the issued capital. A banking company ('Contango') made an offer conditional on 75 per cent acceptance which was submitted by Karak's secretaries ('Williamsons') to the shareholders on 23rd January 1959. On 6th February the offer became unconditional, the sum payable to assenting shareholders being £89,768. Arrangements were made by Contango's bank ('National') for a letter to be prepared confirming that cheques were being despatched to assenting shareholders. The letter was to be handed to Karak at a meeting arranged for 17th February at Williamsons' offices. At this meeting the take-over transaction was to be completed and an extraordinary general meeting of Karak held for the appointment of Contango's nominees as directors in place of the existing board. On 10th February Contango asked Williamsons to arrange for a banker's draft to be issued in favour of National, for the credit of Karak's account, comprising the balance of Karak's cash so that this could be handed to a representative of National at the meeting. On 16th February Contango parted with the benefit of its contract to B in consideration of a sum of £7,000 and thereafter continued to act as undisclosed agents of B. B was informed by Contango that the sum payable by B to Contango on completion would be £98,954. In order to finance the transaction B had come to an arrangement with Minorities, a merchant bank in a small way of business which had overdraft facilities of about £6,000 with the Cannon Street branch of Barclays Bank ('Barclays'). Minorities was run by S who was a customer in good standing with Barclays. On 16th February S, acting on behalf of Minorities, telephoned C, the assistant manager of Barclays, and asked them to issue a draft for £98,954 to be exchanged for another bank draft acceptable to Barclays for £99,504. The Barclays draft was to be delivered to Williamsons' offices on the following day when the Karak take-over meeting was due to take place. This arrangement was quite out of keeping with the usual services provided by ^f a Barclays to S, or to any other customer, although they had made a similar exchange of drafts at S's request some days earlier. C was given no further details about the transaction other than that Barclays might have the opportunity to open an account with a company having a stock exchange quotation, and that S's client was B, who was chairman of a public company, a chartered accountant and a man of importance and integrity. On 17th February C took Barclays' draft to Williamsons' offices where the b Karak meeting was taking place. At the meeting a representative of Williamsons had the Chartered cheque, which was in fact a cheque drawn on the Midland Bank in favour of Karak for £115,890 representing the total cash balance of Karak with Chartered. Just before the meeting commenced C handed over the Barclays draft. On receipt of the draft National duly engaged to pay £89,768 to the assenting shareholders. The extraordinary meeting of Karak took place and B was elected to the Karak board.

c The Chartered cheque in favour of Karak then came into the possession of B who specially endorsed it in favour of Barclays. The cheque then came into the hands of C in place of the promised draft. C entertained no suspicion of any impropriety. He was not aware of the transaction underlying the intended exchange of drafts and did not appreciate that the function of the Barclays draft was to pay for Karak shares. He was merely concerned to carry out the instructions of Minorities and obtain acceptable counter-value for the Barclays draft. After the meeting B left with C and went to the Barclays office where B completed a form appointing Barclays bankers to Karak. C issued a cheque book and B then signed a cheque on behalf of Karak in favour of Barclays for the promised £99,504 which was duly credited to Minorities' account to cover the debit in respect of the earlier Barclays draft. In the result the assets of Karak were used for the purchase of its shares and Karak's cash balance was reduced from some £115,000 to just over £16,000. Karak commenced proceedings

Held – (i) Barclays were liable to Karak for breach of their contractual duty of care for the following reasons—

f (a) although a bank was obliged to pay on demand a cheque which was in proper form and backed by adequate funds, it did not follow that a paying bank was under an absolute unqualified duty to pay without enquiry; it was, on the contrary, under a contractual duty to exercise such care and skill as would be exercised by a reasonable banker and that care and skill included, in appropriate circumstances, a duty to enquire before paying (see p 1231 c to e, post);

g (b) in exercising its duty of care the paying bank was bound to make such enquiries as might, in given circumstances, be appropriate and practical, where it had, or a reasonable banker would have, grounds for believing that the authorised signatories were misusing their authority for the purpose of defrauding their principal or otherwise defeating his true intentions (see p 1231 h and j, post);

h (c) the circumstances in which the Karak cheque came to be tendered to Barclays were so unusual and out of the ordinary course of banking business, the sum involved was so large, and the ground so solid for suspecting that someone was using Karak money to finance the take-over transaction, that a reasonable banker, in the interests of his customer, would have made further enquiries before inviting or allowing the customer's signatories to pay over £99,504 of the customer's money to Minorities (see p 1232 c and g and p 1233 c and d, post);

j (d) although it was open to Barclays to prove on a balance of probabilities that enquiries would have produced answers acceptable to a reasonable banker, so that failure to enquire had led to no loss to Karak, in the circumstances any answers which would have been given by B, had he been questioned, would have been unlikely to have satisfied a reasonable banker that the Karak cheque represented money about to be applied for the purposes of the company (see p 1233 g and p 1234 c and d, post).

Selangor United Rubber Estates Ltd v Cradock (a bankrupt) (No 3) [1968] 2 All ER 1073 followed. a

(ii) Barclays were also liable in equity as constructive trustees for the following reasons—

(a) although, in order to establish liability as a constructive trustee on the part of a third party who had assisted a trustee as his agent in a breach of trust, it was necessary to show that the third party had assisted with knowledge of a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustee, it was not necessary to show that the third party had actual knowledge; it was sufficient to show constructive knowledge, i.e. that the third party had knowledge of circumstances which would have indicated to an honest, reasonable man that such a design was being committed or would have put him on enquiry whether it was being committed (see p 1235 f, p 1236 d, and p 1241 f, post); b

(b) it was plain on the evidence that B, in deliberate and conscious fraud, had procured that £99,504 of Karak's money, i.e. the amount of the Karak cheque, should be misapplied in the purchase of the Karak shares so as to be lost to Karak; furthermore B was to be considered and treated as a trustee in relation to the sum of money comprised in the Chartered cheque and paid into Karak's account with Barclays and Barclays were to be considered as agents of B in his capacity as trustee; for the same reasons as those on which Barclays' breach of contractual duty was founded, a reasonable banker would have been put on enquiry as to the propriety of the Karak cheque and such enquiry would in all probability have revealed the impropriety (see p 1234 h, p 1235 d and p 1241 g, post). c

- By a writ dated 29th January 1965 Karak Rubber Co Ltd ('Karak') claimed a declaration that the first defendant, John Leonard Burden, the second defendant, Douglas Alfred Cross, the third defendant, Minorities Trading & Securities Ltd, the fourth defendant, Barclays Bank Ltd ('Barclays Bank'), and the fifth defendant, Stanley Stewart & Co Ltd, were jointly and severally liable to replace moneys of Karak which
- g had been misapplied. Karak also claimed an order that the first five defendants pay the Official Receiver as liquidator of Karak such sums as any one or more of them should be declared liable to pay. They also claimed against the first and second defendants damages for breach of duty and further or alternatively against Barclays Bank damages for negligence. The sixth defendant, the trustee in bankruptcy of the first defendant, who had been adjudicated bankrupt on 21st May 1968, took no part
- h in the trial. The first defendant ceased to be a defendant by an order made on 15th June 1971. Proceedings against the third defendant were stayed by an order made on 15th January 1970 and the fifth defendant was struck off the register and no relief was sought against it. The facts are set out in the judgment.

I Edwards-Jones QC, J P Warner and R A Morritt for Karak.

- j Leonard Caplan QC, A P Leggatt and M K I Kennedy for Barclays Bank.

The second, third, fifth and sixth defendants did not appear and were not represented.

10th November. BRIGHTMAN J read the following judgment. This action relates to the misfortunes of the Karak Rubber Co Ltd, which I shall call 'Karak', and concerns the liability of its directors and of its bank to make good most of its lost assets. Karak was once a wealthy concern and became insolvent. It was, so it is said, the victim of a species of take-over fraud, whereby those seeking to buy a controlling interest in a company put their fingers in the company's till and steal the money in order to pay for their purchase. The bank was the unconscious tool which aided this process. The principal question in this action is whether it must bear the consequences. The fact that the theft involves a breach of s 54 of the Companies Act 1948 is purely incidental and of no fundamental importance, in my view.

Karak was incorporated under the Companies Acts 1862-1900 in the year 1907 for the purpose of cultivating rubber plantations in Asia. Its issued capital, at the relevant time, was £52,650 divided into £1 shares, which were quoted on the London Stock Exchange. In October 1958 Karak sold its estates and ceased to carry on active business. Thereafter, for practical purposes, its assets consisted only of a sum of the order of £120,000 with its bankers, the Chartered Bank, and £5,000 in tax reserve certificates.

In 1958 the secretaries of Karak were a firm of chartered accountants, Messrs George Williamson & Co (whom I shall call 'Williamsons') with an office at 21 Mincing Lane in the City of London. This was also Karak's registered office. The directors of Karak were Mr Roy (a partner in Williamsons), Mr Cheshire and Mr Clayton, all of whom have acted with complete propriety throughout. The board of Karak decided that the shareholding ought to be realised for the benefit of the members of the company. This could, of course, have been achieved by liquidation. There was, however, a more profitable alternative, which was to offer the shares for sale as a whole, since persons were willing to pay above asset value for shares conferring a controlling interest in a company in this situation. Accordingly, at the end of 1958, the Karak board invited offers for the issued capital. Six offers were received. That which the board resolved to recommend to the shareholders came from Contanglo Banking & Trading Co Ltd (which I shall call 'Contanglo'). Contanglo's offer was 44s per share, compared with an asset value of 41s per share.

Contanglo was a company in a small way of business by comparison with better known banking concerns. It had an office in Mayfair. It was controlled by Mr Levinson, a solicitor (now deceased), with the assistance of Mr Scott. Mr Levinson was interested in property development and Mr Scott was said to be an expert in that field. The directors of Contanglo, behind whom Mr Levinson and Mr Scott operated, were Mr Essex and Mr Meaden. The activities of Contanglo included the purchase either on its own behalf or for clients, of the control of inactive companies possessed of large cash balances. Contanglo's bankers were the National Bank Ltd of Whitehall, London. Contanglo's formal offer was submitted to the Karak directors by a letter dated 13th January 1959. The offer related to the whole of the issued share capital of Karak, and was in the following terms: (1) the purchase price was, as I have stated, 44s per share; (2) the offer was to remain open for acceptance for 14 days unless extended; (3) the offer was conditional on 75 per cent acceptance; (4) the offer was to be despatched by the board to the shareholders as soon as practicable; (5) after completion of the purchase, the existing board was to hold a board meeting at which Contanglo nominees were to be appointed additional directors, and the existing directors would immediately resign; (6) completion was to take place within seven days after the closing of the offer; (7) £3,500 was to be paid to the existing directors as compensation for loss of office.

Contanglo gave the name of its bankers, the National Bank Ltd, and of its solicitors, Mr Levinson's firm, as references to prove Contanglo's ability to implement the offer. The maximum purchase price that could be payable was £115,830. Williamsons, on behalf of Karak, took up Contanglo's references with the National Bank, the manager of which wrote to 'confirm that my customers would be in a position to implement the terms of the offer that is now being made'.

Williamsons, on behalf of Karak, submitted Contanglo's offer to the Karak shareholders in a circular letter dated 23rd January. There was sent with the circular a a combined form of acceptance and transfer, which was to be lodged by each assenting shareholder with Williamsons by 6th February. The circular stated:

'Members accepting the offer will remain members of [Karak] until the 17th February 1959 when the Extraordinary General Meeting of which notice is sent herewith, will be held. On conclusion of that Meeting, and provided that there has been the requisite percentage of acceptances, payment of the purchase money will be made forthwith to the acceptors.'

b The extraordinary general meeting was for the purpose of ratifying the payment of the proposed compensation to the directors.

c On the same day, 23rd January, Contanglo wrote a letter to Karak intimating that it would be a matter of convenience to Contanglo if Karak would transfer its deposit account, then in fact £118,500, from the Chartered Bank to the National Bank in advance of the take-over. Mr Meaden, who wrote this letter on behalf of Contanglo, stated that he had consulted Mr Cheshire, who was agreeable. The board rejected this proposal.

d Correspondence ensued between Williamsons and the National Bank, as bankers to Contanglo, in regard to the payment to Karak shareholders of their purchase money. On 5th February the manager of the National Bank wrote to Williamsons as follows:

'As arranged on the telephone today, I am enclosing a draft letter confirming that cheques are being despatched to the shareholders who have accepted the offer made by the Contanglo Banking and Trading Company Limited. This would be handed to [Karak] at the Meeting at the conclusion of the take-over.'

e The draft was in the form of a letter from the manager of the National Bank, to Williamsons on behalf of Karak, and (in its finally agreed form) read as follows:

'I hereby confirm that cheques to the total value of £89,768. 16s. 0. are today being despatched by this Bank, to shareholders who have accepted the offer set out in your communication to them under date of the 23rd January, 1959.'

f On 6th February Contanglo declared the offer unconditional. The total acceptances on the final count amounted to 40,804, involving the payment to assenting shareholders of the sum of £89,768 16s which I have already mentioned. On 10th February Mr Meaden, on behalf of Contanglo, wrote to Williamsons a letter covering three matters. First, a suggested agenda was enclosed for the board meeting which, it was said, would be held at noon on Tuesday, 17th February. Williamsons were asked to have the agenda, if approved, prepared for that meeting. Secondly, Williamsons were asked to prepare forms showing the change in directors, secretary, registered office, etc. Thirdly, Williamsons were asked to arrange for a banker's draft to be issued in favour of the National Bank, for the credit of Karak's account, comprising the balance of Karak's cash, so that this could be handed to a representative of the National Bank at the meeting. The suggested agenda named the three new Karak directors as Mr Freeman (a Contanglo director), Mr Cacutt (the Contanglo bookkeeper) and Mr Mitchell. The agenda also provided for the transfer of the Karak banking account to the National Bank. In accordance with these proposals Williamsons wrote on 11th February to the Chartered Bank requesting the preparation of a banker's draft in the form required by the suggested agenda. Williamsons said that they would collect the draft at 10.30 a m on 17th February.

j It is clear that as between itself and the Karak shareholders, Contanglo was contracting as principal and not as agent. It would seem likely that, down to the stage in the story which I have reached, Contanglo was buying on its own account beneficially. However, on or shortly before 16th February, Contanglo parted with the benefit of its contract in consideration of a sum of £7,000 and it thereafter completed the contract as undisclosed agent. Its principals were John Leonard Burden and Douglas Alfred Cross, or possibly Mr Burden alone. It is unnecessary to resolve that obscurity, and for convenience I will refer to Mr Burden as if he were the only buyer and the sole principal of Contango. To explain how this change occurred, it will be necessary to go back in time.

Barclays Bank Ltd maintained a branch at 103 Cannon Street, in the City of London, known as the Cannon Street Station branch. The customers of that branch included two concerns, described in the evidence in this action as merchant banks, Collingwoods Securities Ltd and Minorities Trading & Securities Ltd. They had been customers of Barclays Bank for a long time. Their principal business was the provision of finance by way of discounting bills and arranging credit for importers and exporters. The two companies were run by Mr I H Solomons and were owned by him or members of his family. Each of these companies had overdraft facilities with Barclays Bank of relatively modest proportions, about £6,000 in the case of Minorities Trading & Securities Ltd, which I will call 'Minorities'. Mr Solomons is dead, and I have not therefore had the advantage of his evidence.

The assistant manager of the branch was Mr Cooper. He had held that position since 1954. He was about 47 years of age at the time of the relevant events. His banking career had started in 1929 and his experience was considerable and varied. But he had no knowledge or experience of company take-over transactions. The manager of the branch was Mr Hockley. He had been manager throughout the whole of Mr Cooper's appointment. He also had no experience of take-overs.

Mr Solomons was a customer of the bank of long standing. He was highly regarded by both Mr Cooper and Mr Hockley. They found him meticulous in everything he did and said he would do, cautious, and particularly well versed in banking and other financial matters. He was said to be the main power in a firm of chartered accountants known as Sinclair De Mesquita & Co.

In December 1958 Mr Solomons asked Mr Cooper whether Barclays Bank would be willing to provide a certain service, in the form of a facility for exchanging drafts in connection with the take-over or acquisition of public companies intended to be developed as property companies. Mr Solomons stated that previously he had had the assistance of a well-known merchant bank, which he named, for this type of work, but had found the bank expensive, and in any event he would prefer to make use of the services of a clearing bank. Mr Solomons mentioned that Barclays Bank might acquire some valuable accounts in the process. This was an era in which there existed a number of dormant rubber companies with substantial cash balances, and apparently profits were to be made by financiers who possessed the expertise to purchase control and turn the companies to account in other directions. Nothing further was heard by Mr Cooper of this line of business until on, or shortly before, 11th February 1959, Mr Solomons, acting on behalf of Minorities, telephoned Mr Cooper. He asked Mr Cooper if he would be willing to arrange for Barclays Bank to issue a banker's draft for £74,645 2s, take it to the office of certain stockbrokers in Throgmorton Street at 11.30 a.m. on 11th February, and exchange such draft for what Mr Solomons described as 'a Bank draft acceptable to you for £75,100'. The charge for this service was to be a modest 5 gns. The intention of Mr Solomons, as well understood by Mr Cooper and by Mr Hockley (who was cognisant of the proposal), was that the counter-value for the Barclays Bank draft should be a banker's draft which Mr Cooper could regard as good as money, so that there would not in any real sense be any question of Barclays Bank having to grant a loan or extend credit to Minorities. Hence the very small charge. Mr Cooper thinks that Mr Solomons mentioned, during the telephone conversation, that a gentleman called Mr Stekel would be present and would instruct Mr Cooper in the procedure. The proposal was agreed by Mr Cooper and was confirmed by a letter from Minorities dated 11th February.

It was not disputed during the trial that the transaction proposed and agreed was unusual in character and, in relation to Mr Solomons and his companies, unusual in a size. No similar transaction had been done for Collingwoods Securities or Minorities before, or indeed for any other customer of the branch. Be that as it may, when Mr Hockley saw Mr Solomons's letter, as he did, it did not cause him any concern or qualms or hesitation. I may mention that at this time, and during the relevant ensuing days, Minorities' account was overdrawn to the extent of £2,000 to £3,000. There was no question of Barclays Bank regarding Minorities as good for £75,000 or any sum approaching that figure.

b On 11th February Mr Cooper set out for Throgmorton Street with his banker's draft. His impression is that when he arrived at the stockbrokers' office, he was taken into the meeting by Mr Stekel, where he duly exchanged his bank draft for the draft of another bank drawn in favour of Barclays Bank. Mr Cooper may have been at the meeting for some 10 or 20 minutes and he then left on his own. He had not been c able to gather much of what was happening. He did, however, learn that the meeting was concerned with a take-over transaction and that the name of the company concerned was Kota Tinggi (Johore) Rubber Co Ltd. The matter to be noted, because it was repeated, was that Mr Cooper did not request, and Mr Solomons did not volunteer, any explanation why the bank should be asked to issue and hand over its own draft in exchange for another draft for a slightly greater amount; nor did Mr Cooper d ask any questions as to the capacity of Mr Stekel or the extent of his authority. That was the end of the bank's brief acquaintance with Kota Tinggi.

e On Monday 16th February Mr Solomons again telephoned Mr Cooper to arrange for an exchange of drafts. The telephone conversation is reflected in a letter dated 17th February, and probably sent round to the bank by hand on that day. It is signed by Mr Solomons as a director, and by the secretary, of Minorities. It is addressed to the manager of the Cannon Street Station branch of the bank, i e in effect to Mr Hockley, and is in the following terms:

'Confirming telephone conversation of yesterday, we shall be glad if you will arrange for your Draft, in favour of The National Bank Limited, in the sum of £98,954 10. 6d. to be delivered to the offices of Messrs. George Williamson & Co., 21, Mincing Lane, London, E.C.3., today at 12.15 p.m. in exchange for a Bank f Draft acceptable to you of not less than £99,504 10. 6d. [i e £550 more]. We are pleased to agree your fee of £7. 7s. for this service.'

Mr Cooper's impression is that Mr Solomons told him during the course of the prior telephone conversation that the bank might be required, or might have the opportunity, to open a public company account out of the transaction, by which he meant the account of a company with a stock exchange quotation; that Mr Stekel would be g there as previously and would give Mr Cooper his instructions; that Mr Solomons's client was a Mr Burden, who was chairman of ABC Coupler & Engineering Co Ltd, a publicly quoted company, and that Mr Burden was a chartered accountant and a man of importance and integrity.

h I must now interpose certain events which happened between 11th February and noon on 17th February, but bearing in mind that they were quite unknown to Barclays Bank at any relevant time.

j On 16th February, or possibly a day or two earlier but it matters not, Contanglo agreed, as I have mentioned, to sell the benefit of the take-over to Mr Burden for £7,000. On that day Contanglo wrote to Mr Burden enclosing what was called a completion statement, showing that the sum payable by Mr Burden to Contanglo on completion would be £98,954 10s 6d, made up of the sum of £89,768 16s due to the assenting shareholders, the purchase price of £7,000 to Contanglo, and sundry costs and expenses. Contanglo also told Mr Burden that a board meeting of Karak had been arranged for 12.15 p.m. on the following day at 21 Mincing Lane, enclosed a copy of the draft agenda and requested Mr Burden's instructions. Contanglo stated that it would require from Mr Burden a banker's draft made payable to the National Bank for £98,954 10s 6d in accordance with the completion statement. Other action taken by Contanglo on this day was to write to its bankers, the National Bank, to confirm the place and time of the board meeting, stating that:

'At this meeting we shall hand to you a Banker's Draft amounting to £98,954 10. 6d which will adequately cover the cost of the shares . . . We look forward to meeting your representative who will be handing to the Company [i e Karak] a letter from your Bank stating that letters have been despatched to the assenting Shareholders.'

Contanglo also wrote to Williamsons confirming the place and time of the board meeting, but amending the agenda in two relevant respects; first, the new directors were to be Mr Burden, Mr Cross and Mr Stapley instead of the hitherto named Contanglo nominees; secondly, the new Karak bankers were 'to be resolved at the meeting'. The letter concluded:

'We confirm in the meantime that the Banker's Draft [i e for Karak's available cash balance with the Chartered Bank] should be made payable to the Company [i e Karak]. We shall not know until tomorrow the name of the Bankers to be appointed to the Company.'

Mr Burden, for his part, wrote to Minories:

'We shall be glad if you will arrange for a Bank Draft for £98,954. 10. 6. (Ninety eight thousand nine hundred and fifty four pounds ten shillings and six pence) to be issued in favour of the National Bank Limited and handed to Contanglo Banking and Trading Co. Ltd. tomorrow Tuesday 17th February at 12.15 p.m. in exchange for a Bank Draft for £99,504. 10. 6. (Ninety nine thousand five hundred and four pounds ten shillings and sixpence).'

The reason why Mr Burden instructed Minories that the draft to be received in exchange should be £550 in excess of that to be handed to Contanglo's bankers, was that there was a side arrangement (to put it shortly) between Minories, Mr Stekel and Mr Burden, that Minories should receive £150 for commission and bank charges, and that Mr Stekel or his nominees should receive £400 for (I infer) services rendered or to be rendered in connection with the take-over.

It was against that backcloth, invisible to Mr Cooper, that he came onto the stage to play his part. All that he knew was what was stated in Mr Solomons's letter of 16th February to Mr Hockley, and what had been mentioned by Mr Solomons in the preceding telephone conversation. He did not even know the name Karak Rubber Co Ltd.

Some time in the morning of 17th February, Mr Hockley and Mr Cooper signed on behalf of Barclays Bank, a banker's draft for £98,954 10s 6d in favour of the National Bank. I will refer to this as 'the Barclays draft'. The procedure in the case of a banker's draft issued by a branch on behalf of a customer (at least in the case of Barclays Bank's own procedure) is that the banker's draft, when issued, is debited to the account of the customer and credited to an internal suspense account known as 'branch drafts'. When the draft is returned to the bank for payment, which will normally be through the town or general clearing house, it is debited to the suspense account. Thus, as a matter of book-keeping, the draft is debited to the customer at the time when it is issued and not subsequently when the bank is called on to part with the money represented by the draft. The bank statement of Minories accordingly contains a debit on 17th February of £98,954 10s 6d against the entry 'Draft in favour of National Bank Ltd.' When the draft itself was returned through the clearing a day or two later, it was, no doubt, debited to the suspense account which I have mentioned.

So far as Karak was concerned, Tuesday, 17th February, opened with a first board meeting, attended by Mr Cheshire (in the chair), Mr Clayton and Karak's solicitor, Mr Brandt. The meeting was held in the boardroom at Williamsons' office in Mincing Lane. It dealt with formal matters and calls for no comment. It was a followed at 12 noon, in the same room, by an extraordinary general meeting for the purpose only of considering a resolution approving the payment to the outgoing directors of £3,500 compensation for loss of office. Mr Cheshire (in the chair) and Mr Clayton were again present, together with three other shareholders and Mr Brandt. The resolution was not opposed. The completion of the business of that meeting cannot have occupied many minutes.

b The events of 17th February are now over 12 years stale, and not surprisingly the witnesses had some difficulty in recalling all the details. Mr Cooper gave his evidence over a period of three days, and his recollection was tested and retested intensively. Mr Cooper impressed me, and I am certain impressed all concerned in the case who heard him, as a witness of the utmost candour and honesty, and of complete intellectual integrity. His professional reputation was on trial, but he never shirked a question or answered evasively. His sole and manifest purpose was to assist the court to the utmost of his ability, withholding nothing. Inevitably many of his answers were the result of impression and reconstruction, rather than direct recollection.

c The boardroom at Williamsons was about eight paces by six in size, with an oblong table capable of accommodating about eight people in comfort, and occupying about half the space; some chairs were at the table, others against the wall. The persons present just before, or during the whole or some part of, the second board meeting, apart from Mr Cooper, can be identified with reasonable certainty as follows: (1) Mr Cheshire (in the chair at the commencement of the meeting) and Mr Clayton. Both gave evidence. (2) A representative of the National Bank, whose role was to receive a banker's draft for £98,954 10s 6d in accordance with Contango's letter of 16th February and to hand over a letter in the agreed form to Williamsons confirming the despatch that day of cheques to the assenting shareholders in accordance with the prior arrangement between the National Bank and Williamsons. The National Bank representative could not be traced. So no evidence was forthcoming from that quarter. Probably he did not stay until the end of the meeting. (3) Mr Cacutt, Contango's representative, whose job was to see that a banker's draft for £98,954 10s 6d, in favour of National Bank, duly reached the hands of that bank, serving the dual purpose of relieving Contango of its liability to the assenting shareholders and securing the £7,000 consideration due to Contango for the sale of the take-over to Mr Burden. Mr Cacutt gave evidence. He left the meeting at an early stage. (4) Mr Keen, not a partner in, but a highly responsible employee of Williamsons, who had been concerned throughout with the take-over arrangements. I had no evidence from him, owing to his death before the trial. He had a number of documents in his custody before the commencement of the meeting, including the acceptances and transfers by the assenting shareholders, a cheque for £115,890 18s drawn by the Chartered Bank on the Midland Bank in favour of Karak (which I will call 'the Chartered cheque'), the indicia of title to the only other assets of Karak, namely a £5,000 tax reserve certificate and a certificate for a few shares in a company irrelevant to this action, and the resignation of the three existing directors signed in anticipation of an item on the agenda to which I will come later. He placed these documents on the boardroom table, either in front of himself or in front of Mr Cheshire, as the chairman of the meeting. (5) Mr Brandt, Karak's solicitor. He gave evidence. He was present, as he says, merely in case any legal difficulties happened to arise. (6) Mr Simpson, an employee of Williamsons, who kept the list of Karak's shareholders. He was concerned to prepare the boardroom for the three meetings, to lay out the papers and to usher into the room those arriving at 21 Mincing Lane who did not know their way. He gave evidence. (7) Mr Burden and Mr Cross. Neither gave evidence during the trial. Mr Stapley was not present. He is recorded as resigning the next day. (8) Mr Stekel. He made a fleeting appearance on the stage during the trial, pursuant to a subpoena duces tecum. Neither side called him, although he must have known a lot. I am not going to speculate on the reason for his absence as a witness or to comment on the matter. He was available to both sides, and presumably each side took the view that he would not assist its case. I shall leave it at that. (9) Mr Curtis, who was to be the new secretary. He was identified by Mr Cheshire, who happened to know him personally. He was not mentioned by any other witness. He did not give evidence. The total count, including Mr Cooper, was accordingly 12 persons.

I must say a word about the Chartered cheque. This, as I have mentioned, was in the custody of Mr Keen of Williamsons, having been fetched earlier that morning from the Chartered Bank by a representative of Williamsons in accordance with their letter to the bank of 11th February. It was dated 16th February and was drawn by the Chartered Bank on the Midland Bank Ltd in favour of Karak for £115,890 18s, representing the total cash balance of Karak with the Chartered Bank less the £3,500 compensation for directors, which I have mentioned. For some reason the Chartered Bank did not issue its own cheque in favour of Karak, but drew on an account which it maintained with the Midland Bank, so that, in strict banking terms, this instrument was not a banker's draft but a banker's cheque. It would for practical purposes have the same financial standing as a banker's draft. It was a cheque which qualified for the town clearing, of which the Cannon Street Station branch of Barclays Bank was also a member, so that Barclays Bank, if collecting it, would be able to obtain cash the same day without any difficulty. The cheque, as it now exists, contains two endorsements; first a special endorsement and beneath it a general endorsement. The special endorsement is in the handwriting of Mr Burden and reads:

'For and on behalf of Karak Rubber Co., Limited, J. Leonard Burden, director, Pay Barclays Bank Ltd.'

The general endorsement I will deal with later in its chronological place. I am satisfied that the special endorsement was not on the Chartered cheque at the commencement of the meeting.

Mr Cooper had been asked to attend at Williamsons' office at 12.15 p.m. He probably turned up about ten minutes earlier. He had the Barclays draft with him. If he had carried out what the bank had agreed to do, he would have retained the Barclays draft firmly in his grip until someone at Williamsons' office handed to him in exchange a banker's draft equivalent in standing to hard cash, for £99,504 10s 6d. He would then have left Mincing Lane, returned to his branch and paid the exchanged draft into the account of Minorities. And that would probably have been the end of the matter so far as Barclays Bank was concerned. Alternatively, if no one had produced a banker's draft for the purposes of the exchange, Mr Cooper would have returned to his branch with the Barclays draft, cancelled the draft and reversed the entries in the bank's books in accordance with what I am told is normal banking procedure where a draft is issued but not used.

Mr Cooper did not part with the Barclays draft in exchange for another banker's draft. He parted with it in exchange for the Chartered cheque. One of the matters probed in evidence and debated in argument was the moment of time when Mr Cooper handed over the Barclays draft, and whether he received the Chartered cheque into his possession simultaneously or later during the course of the meeting. At the end of the day, I doubt whether this matters very much. Mr Cooper has no positive recollection of how and when he parted with the Barclays draft. I am, however, myself reasonably satisfied that Mr Cooper was imperturbed by a persuasive Mr Stekel into handing over the Barclays draft just before the meeting commenced, without receiving anything in exchange except assurances. I reach this conclusion not only from the general tenor of the evidence of Mr Cooper as he ultimately reconstructed the situation in his own mind, but also because it is in my view unlikely that the National Bank would have engaged itself to pay £89,768 16s to the assenting shareholders, as it did at an early stage of the meeting, without first being put in funds by the receipt of the Barclays draft; and it is unlikely for a number of reasons, including what I have heard from Mr Cheshire, that Mr Cheshire or Mr Keen would a have allowed the Chartered cheque out of his possession until the new board had taken over responsibility for the company.

The evidence indicates that Mr Cooper parted with the Barclays draft, probably to Mr Stekel but conceivably direct to the National Bank representative, in the brief interval of time which elapsed between his arrival at Mincing Lane and the commencement of the second board meeting (which followed immediately after the extraordinary general meeting and not at 12.15 pm) on assurances by Mr Stekel (i) that there existed a banker's cheque in favour of Karak for £115,890 18s, and Mr Stekel may well have taken an opportunity to point to the Chartered cheque lying on the boardroom table; (ii) that Mr Burden and Mr Cross were about to be appointed directors of Karak in the place of the existing board; (iii) that the Chartered cheque would then come into the possession of Mr Burden and Mr Cross; (iv) that the new directors would then open an account for Karak with the Cannon Street Station branch so that the Chartered cheque could be paid into that account; and (v) that Mr Burden and Mr Cross would then draw a cheque on the new Karak account in favour of Barclays Bank, which could be paid into the Minorities account in place of the banker's draft envisaged by Minorities' letter to the bank of 17th February. As security for the due performance of these assurances, Mr Stekel or Mr Burden probably told Mr Cooper that Mr Burden would specially endorse the Chartered cheque in favour of Barclays Bank as soon as he got it. Thus, Mr Cooper would implement his instructions from Minorities in general effect although not in precise detail. Mr Cooper was not aware of the transaction underlying the intended exchange of drafts. He did not appreciate that the function of the Barclays draft was to pay for Karak shares. Mr Cooper was concerned to carry out the instructions of Minorities and to ensure that he received acceptable counter-value for the Barclays draft. I am completely satisfied that he entertained no suspicion whatever of any impropriety at any relevant time.

I also think, on considering the evidence as a whole, that there was a certain amount of hubbub and chatter at the meeting, owing to the number of people attending who had different interests and functions. This left a marked impression on the mind of, at least, Mr Cheshire as chairman of the meeting. The only significance of this is that it would tend to make it difficult for an unversed stranger to pick up the threads of what was occurring.

The course of the proceedings of the second board meeting followed the agenda, and are recounted in the minute book of Karak over the signature of Mr Burden, appended on 15th April. Having heard the evidence, I have no reason to doubt that the minute is correct. I will read the minute and comment later:

g '1. TRANSFERS. Submit 123 Forms of Acceptance and Transfer for a total of 40,804 shares for a consideration of forty-four shillings per share in accordance with the Circular to Shareholders dated 23rd January, 1959. Submitted.

h 2. NATIONAL BANK LTD. Submit letter from National Bank Limited stating that cheques were being despatched this day to assenting Shareholders. Submitted.

3. DIRECTORATE. Resolve to appoint Messrs. J. L. Burden, D. A. Cross and F. G. Stapley Directors of the Company. Carried unanimously. 4. Submit letters of resignation from the Board of Directors from Messrs. O. J. Roy, A. E. Cheshire and R. G. Clayton in which they also state that they waive remuneration under Article 82 of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, as from 17th of February, 1959. Submitted and accepted. Resolved to appoint Mr. J. L. Burden Chairman of The Company. 5. COMPENSATION TO DIRECTORS. Confirm the payments to the Directors Messrs. O. J. Roy, A. E. Cheshire and R. G. Clayton for the loss of office amounting to a total of £3,500. Confirmed. 6. SECRETARIES. Submit letter of resignation from the Secretaries, Geo. Williamson & Co., in which they also state that they waive remuneration under Article 82 of the Memorandum and Articles of Association, as from the 17th February, 1959. Resolve to appoint Mr. C. R. Curtis Secretary to the Company. 7. REGISTRARS. Resolve to appoint Messrs. C. R. Curtis & Co. Registrars to the Company.

8. SITUATION OF THE REGISTERED OFFICE. Resolve to change the Registered Office of the Company to 26 Caxton Street, Westminster, London, S.W.1. Resolved accordingly. 9. ASSETS OF THE COMPANY. Resolve that Geo. Williamson & Co., hand over to the newly appointed Secretaries the following—(1) Tax Reserve Certificate for £5,000 dated 29th March, 1957. (2) Certificate for 24 shares of £1 each in Malgro House Ltd. (3) Banker's Draft for £115,890 18. od. 10. BANKERS. Resolve to close the Company's Accounts with the Chartered Bank and to appoint Barclays Bank Ltd., of 103 Cannon Street, London, E.C.4. 11. RESOLUTIONS [and I think I need not read these; they deal with the honouring of cheques by the bank].^a

Mr Cooper does not recall being present when items 1 and 2 were taken, but I think he must have been there. However, it is not proved that he heard and absorbed these items, and I see no reason, on the evidence before me, for so inferring. In particular, as I have mentioned, he was not aware of the purpose of the Barclays draft and that it was being used for financing the consideration paid by the National Bank to the assenting shareholders. He was not provided with a copy of the agenda. It is likely that he heard and understood items 3, 4, 9 and 10, because he would have been on the look-out for them in view of the assurances which had been given to him by Mr Stekel. I infer that, at the conclusion of item 9, the Chartered cheque was handed to Mr Burden, and that he then and there endorsed it in favour of Barclays Bank and handed it to Mr Cooper. Certainly, it was in Mr Cooper's hands when he left the meeting. Barclays Bank (through Mr Cooper) received the Chartered cheque in its capacity as Karak's prospective banker.^c

Mr Cooper then departed in company with Mr Burden and Mr Cross. They made their way to the Cannon Street Station branch of the bank, where they arrived at or shortly before 1.00 p.m. At the bank, Mr Cooper filled in a copy of the bank's standard form of appointment of Barclays Bank as banker to a company. This form, when completed, recited that at a meeting of the Karak board, held on that day, it was resolved that Barclays Bank be appointed the banker of the company and that the bank was authorised, shortly stated, to honour all cheques signed by Mr Burden and Mr Cross as directors. The completed form was signed by Mr Burden as chairman of Karak. Karak takes no point that the resolution actually passed at Williamsons' office provided that a cheque should be countersigned by the secretary of Karak. At the same time Mr Cooper issued a cheque book for Karak, and wrote out in his own hand a cheque drawn on the Karak account, in favour of Barclays Bank, for the promised £99,504 10s 6d. This cheque was then signed by Mr Burden and Mr Cross on behalf of Karak and handed to Mr Cooper, or to Mr Hockley, who at some time had joined them. Mr Cross filled in a paying-in slip in respect of the Chartered cheque. The four of them then took some refreshment at a nearby place, and parted company. In due course the bank credited the Chartered cheque (endorsed by Mr Hockley on behalf of Barclays Bank) to Karak's new banking account debited to that account the cheque for £99,504 10s 6d, which I will call 'the Karak cheque', and credited the Karak cheque to the Minorities account, thus covering the debit for the Barclays draft made on the same day. No suspicion of any sort had been aroused in the mind either of Mr Hockley or Mr Cooper.^d

There are no other events which are directly material to the possible liability of Barclays Bank and I can therefore cover the ground quite briefly. Karak started 17th February with a cash balance, after allowing for the directors' compensation, of over £115,000. It ended the day with just over £16,000. Four months later, having cashed its tax reserve certificates but conducted no real business, its cash balance was down to £3 8s 8d. It lingered on, with never more than £850 in its coffers, and usually much less, until in June 1961 it was wound up compulsorily on the petition of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue based on an indebtedness of some £10,000. The shares of the assenting shareholders were registered first in the name of the National Bank (Branch Offices Nominees) Ltd, but were later transferred (less a few sold off)^e a to Mr Burden and Mr Cross. Mr Cross ceased to be a director in August 1960. On 14th November 1960 the Board of Trade appointed inspectors to investigate the affairs of the company. The inspectors reported on 31st July 1961. On 29th January 1965 the writ in this action was issued.

b The action is brought by Karak with the authority of the Official Receiver, as liquidator. The action is also brought by the Board of Trade (now the Department of Trade and Industry) in the name of Karak, pursuant to s 169 (4) of the Companies Act 1948.

c The first defendant to the action is Mr Burden. He was adjudged bankrupt in 1968. He ceased to be a defendant by an order made on 15th June 1971. I have been told that in fact he has died. The second defendant is Mr Cross. He has served what is called a defence. It is couched in informal language, and says that he did what Mr Burden told him to do. He has taken no part during the trial. The third defendant is d Minorities, against whom proceedings have been stayed as a result, I believe, of some sort of compromise. The fourth defendant is Barclays Bank, which alone has fought the action. The fifth defendant is a company called Stanley Stewart & Co Ltd. It is said to have received some of the pickings in the form of a cheque for £1,750 on the Karak account paid on 18th February 1959, and alleged to have been a misapplication of Karak's moneys. This company has however been struck off the register, and no relief is sought against it. The sixth defendant is Mr Burden's trustee in bankruptcy. He has the benefit of the defence served by Mr Burden. He appeared before me to say that he had no funds to enable him to take any part in the trial.

e For practical purposes the relief claimed is as follows: (1) Against Mr Cross and Mr Burden's trustee in bankruptcy, replacement of the amount of the Karak cheque and of the £1,750 paid to Stanley Stewart Ltd, totalling £101,254 10s 6d with interest at 5 per cent from 17th February 1959. (2) Against Barclays Bank Ltd, replacement of the amount of the Karak cheque, or a like sum by way of damages for negligence with interest as aforesaid. (3) Against all three defendants, the cost of the Board of Trade investigation.

f I will deal first with the claim against Barclays Bank. It is pleaded that a sum equal to the amount of the Barclays draft was, by the process of honouring the Karak cheque, applied not for the purposes or benefit of Karak but for the benefit of Mr Burden, Mr Cross, Minorities and Barclays Bank. So far as the bank was concerned, (a) it discharged at Karak's expense the indebtedness of Minorities to Barclays Bank for the amount of the Barclays draft, or (b) it prevented such indebtedness arising, or (c) it recouped to Barclays Bank the amount for which Barclays Bank was liable on the Barclays draft, or (d) it enabled Barclays Bank, in substance, (although not in g form) to comply with the arrangement which it had made with Minorities as recorded in the letter of 17th February from the latter to the former. Karak also pleads that the amount of the Karak cheque was misapplied in giving financial assistance for the purpose of, or in connection with, the purchase of the assented shares and was ultra vires Karak.

h It is not now claimed against Barclays Bank that either Mr Hockley or Mr Cooper was consciously aware that the amount of the Karak cheque represented money being misapplied by Mr Burden and Mr Cross, either by giving financial assistance for the purpose of, or in connection with, the purchase of the assented shares, or in any other context. It is pleaded nevertheless that Barclays Bank ought to have known that such money was being misapplied because a reasonable banker and a reasonable businessman would have derived such knowledge from the facts of which Mr Hockley i and Mr Cooper were actually aware. Alternatively, it is said, the bank would have derived such knowledge if certain enquiries had been made which ought to have been made. The enquiries which ought to have been made, it is said, were (1) enquiries from persons present at the second board meeting, as to the nature of the transaction being carried out, the source of the Chartered cheque and the destination of the Barclays draft; the persons so identified as those of whom enquiries ought to have been made were the outgoing Karak directors, the representatives of Williamsons, Contanglo and the National Bank, and Messrs Burden, Cross and Stelkel; and (2) enquiries from Mr Burden and Mr Cross as to the consideration for the Karak cheque. It is further pleaded that Barclays Bank was negligent in the performance of the duty which, as banker, it owed to Karak as its customer in honouring the Karak cheque without (a) making any enquiry as to the purpose for which the money was being applied, or (b) taking steps to ensure that the money would be applied only for the purposes and benefit of Karak, or (c) making the above-mentioned enquiries at the board meeting or of Mr Burden and Mr Cross.

The claim against Barclays Bank is based on the interpretation of the law laid down by Ungood-Thomas J in Selangor United Rubber Estates Ltd v Cradock (a bankrupt) (No 3)¹. That is to say, it is founded on the principles of constructive trusteeship as elucidated in that case, and also on the principles of contract which that case decided were applicable as between banker and customer where the banker is acting as paying banker. In the Selangor case¹ the learned judge considered constructive trusteeship before breach of contract, as also did the plaintiff's counsel in opening this case. However, in reply, the plaintiff's counsel put breach of contract in the forefront of his case, at least chronologically, and I propose likewise to deal with the two topics in that sequence.

The facts of the Selangor case¹, so far as material for present purposes, can be outlined as follows. Selangor was a dormant company with about £235,000 in liquid assets, including some £232,500 to its credit with Barclays Bank. On 31st March 1958 Contanglo, as agent for an unidentified principal, one Cradock, offered to buy the whole of the issued stock of Selangor for cash, conditional on a minimum percentage acceptance. On 17th April Contanglo declared the offer unconditional. Completion was due to take place on 25th April. The purchase price and certain expenses totalled about £188,000. On 21st April the outgoing Selangor board, at the request of Contanglo, transferred the company's cash from Barclays Bank to the National Bank. The National Bank was Contanglo's banker. Cradock had a personal banking account with the Oxford Street branch of the District Bank, where he had an insignificant credit. On 23rd April Cradock asked the District branch manager to prepare a banker's draft in favour of Contanglo for £195,322 and to attend at the National Bank on 25th April in order to exchange it for a banker's draft in favour of Cradock for £235,000. The branch manager agreed to do this. On 25th April a board meeting of Selangor was held at the National Bank premises. Reynolds attended as the representative of District Bank. He had with him the banker's draft which had been requested. At the meeting Reynolds was told by Cradock that Selangor's banking account with available cash totalling £232,764, was about to be transferred to the Oxford Street branch of the District Bank; that Selangor would then draw a cheque for £232,500 on its new banking account in favour of a company called Woodstock Trust Ltd; that Woodstock Trust would endorse such cheque in favour of Cradock, who would pay it into his account with the District Bank. Reynolds was asked, and agreed, to exchange his banker's draft, not for another banker's draft as previously arranged, but for an alleged equivalent, namely, Selangor's cheque for £232,500 drawn in favour of Woodstock Trust and endorsed to Cradock. Contanglo, having thus obtained the banker's draft for £195,322, paid into its account with the National Bank and thus covered on behalf of Cradock the £188,000 due on completion of the take-over offer. On these facts, which I have only briefly summarised, Selangor claimed, inter alia, against District Bank damages for negligence in performance of the duty which, it was claimed, District Bank owed to Selangor as its customer. The negligent act alleged was debiting the £232,500 cheque against Selangor's account without making any, or any sufficient, enquiry as to the purpose for which the £232,500 was being paid to Woodstock Trust for Cradock.

It is convenient to refer to the bank on which a cheque is drawn by its customer as a 'the paying bank', and to refer to the bank which receives the cheque for the purpose of collecting payment on behalf of its customer as 'the collecting bank'. The claim in contract against the District Bank in the Selangor case² was, and the claim against Barclays Bank in the case before me is, a claim against such bank in its capacity as paying bank.

b The question accordingly arose in the Selangor case² as to the nature and extent of the contractual duty of care owed by a paying bank to its customer when called on to honour a cheque drawn by the customer; and in particular, in the case of a corporate customer which has given the usual mandate to its bank, to what extent the bank is entitled to place exclusive reliance on the fact that the cheque is signed by the corporation's duly authorised signatories. The conclusion reached by Ungood-Thomas J was as follows³:

c '... a bank has a duty under its contract with its customer to exercise "reasonable care and skill" in carrying out its part with regard to operations within its contract with its customer. The standard of that reasonable care and skill is an objective standard applicable to bankers. Whether or not it has been attained in any particular case has to be decided in the light of all the relevant facts, which can vary almost infinitely. The relevant considerations include the d prima facie assumption that men are honest, the practice of bankers, the very limited time in which banks have to decide what course to take with regard to a cheque presented for payment without risking liability for delay, and the extent to which an operation is unusual or out of the ordinary course of business. An operation which is reasonably consonant with the normal conduct of business (such as payment by a stockbroker into his account of proceeds of sale of his e client's shares) of necessity does not suggest that it is out of the ordinary course of business. If "reasonable care and skill" is brought to the consideration of such an operation, it clearly does not call for any intervention by the bank. What intervention is appropriate in that exercise of reasonable care and skill again depends on circumstances.'

'As between the company and the bank, the mandate, in my view, operates within the normal contractual relationships of customer and banker and does not exclude them. These relationships include the normal obligation of using reasonable skill and care; and that duty, on the part of the bank, of using reasonable skill and care, is a duty owed to the other party to the contract, the customer, g who in this case is the plaintiff company, and not to the authorised signatories. Moreover, it extends over the whole range of banking business within that contract. So the duty of skill and care applies to interpreting, ascertaining, and acting in accordance with the instructions of a customer; and that must mean his really intended instructions as contrasted with the instructions to act on signatures misused to defeat the customer's real intentions. Of course, omnia praesumuntur rite esse acta, and a bank should normally act in accordance with the

In the result, the learned judge concluded that the circumstances were such as to put a reasonable banker on enquiry in accordance with its contractual duty of care.

i This conclusion was reached after considering certain cases dealing with the contract existing between a paying bank and its customer, including *Bellamy v Marjoribanks*⁵, decided in 1852, *Curtice v London City & Midland Bank Ltd*⁶, decided by the Court of Appeal in 1908, and *Westminster Bank Ltd v Hilton*⁷, decided by the House of Lords in 1926. It was also reached after considering a number of cases against collecting banks. Where a collecting bank is sued by the true owner of a cheque for wrongful payment thereof, the claim is for conversion or for money had and received, and not in contract. There is no contractual relationship between the person who draws the cheque and the bank to which the cheque is handed for collection (unless the collecting bank is also the paying bank). Negligence (although not an ingredient of a claim in conversion or for money had and received) is however a relevant topic because s 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882 and its modern counterpart afford a statutory defence to a claim by the true owner where a banker has collected a crossed cheque in good faith and without negligence on behalf of a customer who has no title or a defective title. The collecting bank cases were cited to the learned judge and relied on by him for the purpose of providing illustrations of circumstances constituting carelessness in a banking context and as indications of the standard of care demanded of bankers.

I would be guilty of causing a quite unjustified waste of time and paper if I sought to restate and reanalyse the numerous cases on the duties of bankers which were so recently subjected to critical examination in the Selangor case⁸. I shall therefore turn at once to the nature of the attack which has been levied in this case on the correctness of the *Selangor*⁸ decision in contract.

The proposition advanced by counsel on behalf of Barclays Bank is short and simple, and in one sense commercially attractive because readily workable by junior banking staff. It is this. The primary obligation of a paying bank, in relation to a cheque which is presented for payment, and is clear and unambiguous on its face, and is authenticated by the proper signature or signatures, and is covered by available funds, is to pay the cheque on demand. Subject to two apparent exceptions so far as a corporate customer is concerned, the paying bank has no right or duty to exercise any care, skill or judgment in deciding whether it will or will not comply with the unambiguous, properly authenticated instructions of its customer. By virtue of issuing a cheque book to the customer, the bank has engaged itself to pay any such cheque on demand if funds be available. That is the intention of both bank and customer when the account is opened. The paying bank has a duty of care to its customer, but that duty is a limited one. It does not embrace the question whether the bank ought or ought not to do that which the customer has, in the agreed manner, told it to do. It only embraces (1) reasonable care in interpreting the instructions of its customer (for example, in interpreting a communication countermanding payment), and (2) reasonable care in making itself available to receive the instructions of the customer (for example, by opening its doors at reasonable hours and attending with reasonable expedition to its customer's postal communications). The two exceptions admitted in the case of a corporate customer to the basic and fundamental rule that the paying bank is to dispense cash automatically against an unambiguous and properly authenticated cheque are: (a) if the payment is to the actual, conscious knowledge of the bank a wrongful application of the company's money, or (b) if the payment is for a purpose known to the bank but such purpose (unknown to the bank) is precluded by the memorandum or articles of association. The first exception depends on the fact that it is an implied term of the contract between banker and customer that the banker shall act honestly and in good faith towards its customer. If a bank knowingly pays a cheque which is a wrongful application of its customer's money, it is acting dishonestly and therefore in breach of contract. The second exception depends on the fiction that persons have notice of the contents of a company's memorandum and articles of association.

a (1) Neither the *Bellamy*⁹ nor the *Curtice*¹⁰ nor the *Hilton*¹¹ case was a proper foundation for the learned judge's conclusion. The Bellamy case⁹ was concerned with the crossing of a cheque; such crossing was a device, he submitted, to protect the true owner by securing payment only through a banker; the case was not concerned with any duty of care owed by the paying bank to its own customer. The Curtice case¹⁰ was concerned with a paying bank's obligation when the customer
b seeks to communicate the countermanding of a cheque; it therefore lies within the area where admittedly the bank has a duty of care. So also the Hilton case¹¹, which was concerned with the interpretation of an ambiguous countermand.

(2) The learned judge could not properly rely on the collecting bank cases or on any analogy with the position or duties of a collecting bank. A collecting bank has no instant duty of action comparable with that which is incumbent on a paying bank.
c As between itself and its customer, a collecting bank merely has a duty to collect a cheque with reasonable expedition. The cases where, in a suit between a collecting bank and a third party, the collecting bank has sought to disprove negligence in order to secure the protection of s 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882, are irrelevant to the existence, or non-existence, of a general duty of care on the part of a paying bank. The cases under s 82 relate to a duty of care which is different in origin, in d character and in scope from the kind of duty with which the court was concerned in the Selangor case¹²; different in origin, because the duty arises by virtue of a statute and not by virtue of a contractual implication; different in character, because it is not a duty which the collecting banker owes to anyone save himself; the true owner of the cheque cannot sue the collecting banker for breach of a duty of care; the collecting banker exercises care solely in order to avoid liability to the true owner in conversion or for money had and received; different in scope, because no standard e of care is laid down by s 82.

(3) As a cheque is by statutory definition and by its own inherent nature a bill of exchange payable on demand, the banker is by the essential nature of the contract between him and his customer prima facie required to pay his customer's cheque on demand. Apart from all else, to dishonour a cheque may defame the drawer or f impair his credit. Any gloss on that contract which requires the banker to pay his customer's clear, unambiguous and properly authenticated cheque not on demand but (in certain circumstances) only after critical thought and the conduct of an inquisitorial exercise, can only arise by implication. A term which finds no expression in a contract is not to be implied unless necessary in a business sense to give efficacy to the contract; that is to say, if it is a term of which it can confidently be predicted that g it is so obvious that it goes without saying: *Reigate v Union Manufacturing Co (Ramsbottom) Ltd*¹³. The *Reigate*¹³ test was not applied in the Selangor case¹², nor was the Reigate case¹³ mentioned in argument. The terms supposed, in any event, could not have been implied in the absence of evidence of banking practice and procedure, of which there was none. In the absence of such evidence the court would not know what was obvious to a banker in the context of a bill of exchange payable on demand.
h The *Reigate*¹³ test could only properly be posed within the framework of evidence of the time available to a paying bank when called on to pay over the counter, or under the town clearing rules or under the general clearing rules.

(4) It was said that important cases exemplifying the right of a customer of a bank to have his cheque paid on demand were not cited to the learned judge in *Selangor*¹². One of these cases was *Marzetti v Williams*¹⁴, which was decided in the Court of King's j Bench in 1830. In that case the plaintiff had a credit of approximately £70 with his bankers by the evening of 17th December 1828. At 11.00 a.m. on 19th December a further sum of £40 was paid into the account in cash. At 3.00 p.m. on that day a cheque, drawn by the plaintiff in favour of certain payees for £87, was presented for payment. The bank clerk, to whom the cheque was presented, said that there were insufficient funds in the account for payment. It was found as a fact that enough time had elapsed, between the payment in of the £40 and the presentation of the cheque, for the £40 to have been credited to the account. An action was brought by the customer against the bankers for damages. The action was in substance founded on a contract by the banker to pay the cheques of his customer when the latter had funds sufficient in his hands for that purpose¹⁵. The plaintiff succeeded in his claim because 'he had a right to have his cheque paid at the time when it was presented, and the defendants were guilty of a wrong for refusing to pay it'¹⁶. Another case, absent from the *Selangor*¹⁷ citations, on which counsel for Barclays Bank relied, was *Marten v Rocke, Eyton & Co*¹⁸ decided by North J in 1885. Morris was an auctioneer of cattle. He had a single banking account into which it was his custom to pay the gross proceeds of sale of livestock and out of which he would pay the sellers after deducting his commission. His current account was overdrawn by about £2,250 in December 1884 when he paid in the sum of £2,229 representing most of the proceeds of the last auction sales. The defendant bank withdrew Morris's credit facilities and applied this amount in part discharge of the overdraft. Morris became bankrupt, and the plaintiff Marten, and other sellers, were not paid. Marten claimed that the bank held the money, less commission, as trustee for the benefit of himself and other unpaid vendors. The action failed. Counsel for Barclays Bank relied on the following statement of North J as emphasising the basic obligation of a bank to honour a cheque save where the bank is privy to a wrong¹⁹:

'The defendants could not have refused to honour Morris's cheques against the fund paid in (assuming the account to have been in credit) unless [the bankers] were actually privy to an intended breach of trust by Morris...'

A third case on which counsel relied was *Bank of England v Vagliano Brothers*²⁰. The plaintiff Vagliano carried on business as a merchant and a banker, originally in partnership but from May 1887 alone, under the trade name of Vagliano Brothers. The Bank of England was his banker. The plaintiff employed a clerk called Glyka. Glyka had responsible duties and enjoyed the plaintiff's complete confidence. Between February and August 1887 Glyka, by a series of frauds, obtained the plaintiff's genuine acceptance of 43 forged bills of exchange and thereby secured for himself £71,500 which he utilised to cover losses incurred on the stock exchange. Glyka's procedure was to forge the name of a well-known customer of Vagliano Brothers as if such customer were the drawer of a bill of exchange on Vagliano Brothers, the bill being expressed to be payable to Petridi, who was well known to the plaintiff. Glyka then, by a deception, secured the genuine signature of the plaintiff as acceptor of the bill, the bill being marked as payable at the Bank of England. Glyka's next step was to forge the endorsement to Petridi in favour of a fictitious name. Glyka, or his agent, then presented the bill in due time at the Bank of England for payment in cash across the counter, an unusual but not improper course. The plaintiff claimed that the Bank of England had wrongly debited his account with the £71,500, on the basis that a bank which agrees to pay its customer's acceptances has a duty as between itself and its customer to identify the person to a whom it makes payment as the person properly entitled to that payment. It was held by a majority in the House of Lords that the bank was not liable because (i) it had been misled by the plaintiff who, by his signatures, had given apparent authenticity to the forgeries and (ii) that the bank was entitled to treat the forgeries as bills payable to bearer because Petridi was a fictitious or non-existent person within the meaning of s 7 of the Bills of Exchange Act 1882. Counsel for Barclays Bank relied on a number of passages in the speeches to support his proposition that there is an obligation on a bank to pay without enquiry a cheque or other bill of exchange which is clear on its face and properly authenticated. The principal passages are these: Lord Halsbury LC said¹:

c 'Suppose they had been genuine signatures of Petridi and the bills had been dishonoured while the bankers were making inquiries, would not Mr. Vagliano have had grave ground for complaint against the bankers who had allowed his credit to be thus disturbed? I think each of the parties to the transaction must be taken to have known the ordinary course of mercantile affairs, and it is manifest that no banker could hesitate to pay such bills as came to him, so accredited as they were by Mr. Vagliano's acceptance, without throwing the whole mercantile world into confusion.'

'I do not agree with the notion that a banker is entitled to make inquiries as to whether he should pay, as there suggested. [That was a reference to *Robarts v Tucker*³.] He must honour or dishonour the bill on presentment.'

e 'Bankers who undertake the duty of paying their customer's acceptances cannot do otherwise than pay off-hand, and, as a matter of course, bills presented for payment which are duly accepted and regular and complete upon the face of them. It would be out of the question for a banker to adopt the suggestion made by one of the learned Judges in *Robarts v. Tucker*³, and defer payment until satisfied by inquiry and investigation that all the indorsements on the bill are genuine. That is hardly a practical suggestion. A banker so very careful to avoid risk would soon have no risk to avoid.'

In *Bank of Baroda Ltd v Punjab National Bank Ltd*⁵ the Punjab Bank sued the Baroda Bank on a cheque. The Punjab Bank claimed as holders for value of a cheque drawn by a customer of the Baroda Bank on that bank and endorsed generally by the payees. g The customer had no funds, but the cheque, which was post-dated, had been marked on its face by an officer of the Baroda Bank with a statement indicating that the account was good for the money. A question which arose was whether a cheque, being a bill drawn on a bank payable on demand, was capable of acceptance in the same way as other bills of exchange were accepted. In delivering the opinion of the Board, Lord Wright, after contrasting the acceptance of a cheque with the acceptance h of a bill of exchange, said⁶:

'Other things being equal, in particular, if the customer has sufficient funds or credit available with the bank, the bank is bound either to pay the cheque or dishonour it at once.'

Barclays Bank has led evidence of banking practice. This was given by a Mr Avis. j He had been in the employment of the Midland Bank for 35 years and was now the manager of the High Holborn branch of that bank. Counsel for Barclays Bank referred to the strait-jacket of time within which a paying bank operated, and which in his submission precluded the sort of enquiry which the Selangor case⁷ held to be incumbent on a paying bank in certain circumstances. There are three situations to be considered. (1) A case where an open cheque is presented to the paying bank over the counter for payment in cash. In such a case the payee obviously expects payment at once and there are practical difficulties in the way of any appreciable delay. (2) A crossed cheque where both the drawer and the payee of the cheque are customers of the same branch of the bank. In that case the bank is acting both as collecting bank and as paying bank and the debit to the account of the drawer of the cheque and the credit to the account of the payee of the cheque is an internal matter of the branch concerned. In this case the bank has the whole of the day in which to make the decision whether to debit the cheque to the one account and credit it to the other account. Mr Avis believed that he was right in saying that as a matter of practice the bank had the power to hold the cheque over until the following day if necessary. (3) Cheques which fall to be paid through the clearing arrangements. A large part of the evidence of Mr Avis was directed to banking practice in regard to clearing arrangements.

The principal clearing arrangement is the general clearing house. About 2½ million cheques pass through the general clearing house each day. The system works in this way. Assume that a customer of a country branch of the C bank (the collecting bank) is the payee of a cheque drawn on a country branch of the P bank (the paying bank). I use the expression 'country branch' merely to exclude a branch which is a member of the town clearing to which I will refer later. Assume that the payee hands the cheque to the branch of the C bank on Monday for collection. The branch posts the cheque on that day to its own head office in London, where it will arrive in due course of post on Tuesday. On Tuesday the head office of the C bank bundles together, according to banks, all cheques which are to be collected. All cheques drawn on the P bank will therefore comprise one bundle. A representative of the C bank takes these bundles to the general clearing house, and receives in exchange from a representative of the P bank a corresponding bundle of cheques drawn on the C bank. The total of one bundle of cheques is set off against the total of the other bundle of cheques and a balance struck, but I need not deal with that aspect. On Tuesday the head office of the P bank posts to the relevant branches of the P bank all cheques drawn on such branches which the head office has received through the general clearing house. The cheque with which I am dealing accordingly arrives back in the normal course of post at the country branch of the P bank on Wednesday. This will be the first that this branch knows of this cheque. The branch must then decide whether to pay the cheque or not to pay. If the branch decides not to pay the cheque, it must send the cheque back to the relevant branch of the C bank by the last post on Wednesday, so that in due course of post it will arrive at such collecting bank on Thursday morning. If the collecting bank has not received the cheque back by that time, it is entitled in all normal circumstances to treat the cheque as having been duly paid by the paying bank and to treat the amount of the cheque as a cleared amount in the account maintained with its customer. In the result, the paying bank has a period of time extending from the incoming post in the morning until the outgoing post in the evening to decide whether or not to pay the cheque. So much for the general clearing. The town clearing gives the paying banker much less time. The town clearing applies only to certain branches of the clearing banks within a limited area of London, and it applies only to cheques of £5,000 and upwards. A cheque is cleared through the town clearing when both the paying branch and the collecting branch are members of the town clearing. Cheques for the town clearing are taken to the town clearing house at intervals during the day, the last delivery being 3.45 p.m.

a If the paying banker, having collected cheques drawn on him from the town clearing house, decides not to pay a cheque, he must return that cheque to the town clearing house not later than 4.30 pm on the same day. Otherwise the collecting branch is entitled to treat the cheque as cleared. Allowing for the time which would be taken by the messenger in bringing the last batch of cheques back from the town clearing house to the branch in question, it is plain that the paying bank may not have many minutes in which to make up its mind whether to honour the cheque. The minimum sum of money and the clock times which I have mentioned are those now applicable, and different sums and times have applied in other eras. The changes are however of no significance in this case. There are also local clearances. Mr Avis had no experience of them and they play no part in this case.

b In my view the Achilles heel of the bank's argument, both in the Selangor case⁸ and in the case before me, is that it is not, and never reasonably could be, asserted that a paying bank with certain knowledge that the authorised signatories are misapplying the company's funds may nonetheless rely on their signatures. If that is axiomatic, and it was conceded so to be in the case before me, it seems utterly irrational to suppose that a bank has an absolute unqualified duty to pay and no duty to enquire despite a deep suspicion, approaching but falling short of a certainty, that the funds are being misapplied. Once a bank disclaims the untenable position of being in all cases an automatic cash dispenser, whatever the circumstances, there is no rational stopping-place short of a contractual duty to exercise such care and skill as would be exercised by a reasonable banker in similar circumstances. And that care and skill must rationally include, in appropriate circumstances, a duty to enquire before paying. I appreciate the simplicity and convenience of counsel's able submission, particularly in an age when banking transactions are reckoned in their daily millions and a rapid turnover of staff may present practical difficulties. But on the broader view expediency is not a persuasive argument for excusing a banker from enquiring in all circumstances short of certainty, when of course enquiry would be needless. Without, therefore, reference to authority I would myself be disposed in principle to adopt, without any qualification, that contractual duty of care which has been propounded by the learned judge in the Selangor case⁸, because it seems to me rational. I discern nothing in the cases which have been read to me which is inconsistent with that conclusion. None of the cases relied on by the bank, in support of its defence, was directed towards the type of problem which I have to decide; that is to say, whether, despite a primary obligation to pay a cheque on demand, a bank owes to its customer a duty of care which may, in an extreme case, oblige it to question the authority of an authorised signatory. Nor do I think it is right to assume that the learned judge in the Selangor case⁸ suffered from an absence of evidence of the practice of bankers. He was not dealing, any more than I am dealing, with a case where a cheque is presented over the counter or is subject to the exigencies of the town or general clearing timetables, nor with anything remotely approaching a normal cheque transaction. I have not overlooked the *Reigate*⁹ test, which was much pressed on me with persuasive illustrations of hypothetical question and answer. In my judgment the implied duty of care formulated in the Selangor case⁸ passes that test without trouble. The proper question, in my view, which should supposedly be put to paying banker and customer, in a case such as the present, is whether the banker is to exercise reasonable care and skill in transacting the customer's banking business, including the making of such enquiries as may, in given circumstances, be appropriate and practical if the banker has, or a reasonable banker would have, grounds for believing that the authorised signatories are misusing their authority for the purpose of defrauding their principal or otherwise defeating his true intentions. The answer to that question is so obvious that I forbear to give it.

A shorter course for me to have taken would have been to adopt the decision in the Selangor case¹⁰ without expressing my own opinion. Counsel on both sides accepted that that decision must have high persuasive authority so far as I am concerned, and that it would be correct for me to follow it unless I were convinced that it was wrong: *Metropolitan Police District Receiver v Croydon Corpn*¹¹. I did not take that easy line out of deference to the elaborate and partially new submissions developed before me.

The question accordingly arises whether Barclays Bank, in the performance of its contractual duty of care as a paying bank, should have made enquiry as to the propriety of the Karak cheque before honouring it. Matters to be considered include (1) first and foremost whether the operation was unusual and out of the ordinary course of banking business, (2) the magnitude of the transaction, (3) the time and opportunity available to the bank for making an enquiry, and (4) the degree of suspicion which the known facts would have provoked in the mind of a reasonable banker. In my opinion the operation proposed to the bank in Minories' letter of 17th February was without question unusual and remote from the ordinary course of banking business. It involved the exchange of one banker's draft for another banker's draft of slightly greater amount in unrevealed circumstances. Not the least astonishing feature, to my mind, is that no explanation was sought by Mr Hockley or Mr Cooper. It was not the type of transaction customarily carried out by Barclays Bank or, so far as the evidence went, by any other bank. It became no less unusual or out of the ordinary course of banking business in the altered form it assumed at the second board meeting. The Karak cheque, as I have already indicated, by no stretch of imagination represented an ordinary cheque transaction. As to the magnitude of the transaction, it was large in relation to the normal business of Minories, in relation to the creditworthiness of Minories and in relation to the known assets of Karak. There was ample time and opportunity for the bank to make enquiries. The effective incoming directors of Karak were in the company of Mr Cooper for at least an hour after the end of the second board meeting. As to the degree of suspicion which would have been aroused in the mind of a reasonable banker, the bank, through Mr Hockley and/or Mr Cooper, knew by the end of the board meeting (a) that the meeting had been concerned with the take-over of a company called Karak, (b) that the effective control of that company had passed to Mr Burden and Mr Cross at that meeting, (c) that the delivery of the Barclays draft was a step taken in the course of that take-over, (d) that the Karak cheque was intended to cover the Barclays draft, and (e) that the Karak cheque represented money which was the property of Karak. A reasonable banker who was neither obtuse, as Mr Cooper was not, nor distracted by other cares, as Mr Cooper was, would have reasoned that the Barclays draft probably represented the price of the take-over and that Karak money was probably being used to pay that price. Mr Hockley and Mr Cooper were both honest and reasonable bankers. Mr Cooper, however, was completely thrown off his guard by his well-founded anxiety to secure the promised funds to off-set the Barclays draft. He thought, rightly, that in the absence of such funds the bank might not be entitled to debit Minories with the cost of a draft, or recover such cost even if rightly debited. Mr Hockley was less versed in the facts and no doubt was content to rely on Mr Cooper.

'Q Was the real position that it (the Chartered cheque) was fulfilling more than one role, that it was the promise about to be fulfilled of a new account of a company? A Yes.

'Q That it was the lifeline by which the bank account at risk for £98,000 was to be pulled safely to shore? A Yes to both counts.

¹⁰ [1968] 2 All ER 1073, [1968] 1 WLR 1555

¹¹ [1956] 2 All ER 785, [1956] 1 WLR 113

a 'Q So really the opening of [Karak's] account when you got back, whilst desirable in itself, was also serving the paramount concern of yourself to obtain the countervalue you had gone out to seek? A Yes.

'Q And your mind when you got back to the bank was primarily concerned with getting that counter-value with a sense of relief that you had got that far? A Yes.

b 'Q And you were not really directing your mind to anything else? A This was my prime concern.'

In my judgment the circumstances were so unusual and out of the ordinary course of banking business, the sum involved so large, and the ground so solid for suspecting that someone was using Karak money to finance the take-over transaction, that a reasonable banker would in the interests of his customer have made further enquiries before inviting or allowing the customer's signatories to pay over £99,504 of the customer's money to the account of Minorities. I do not take the view that a reasonable banker would necessarily have made such enquiries at the board meeting itself. At that stage Barclays Bank had not become Karak's banker, Karak had no assets with Barclays Bank and the Karak cheque, although envisaged, had not been drawn. A reasonable banker, possessed of the knowledge of Mr Cooper but, unlike Mr Cooper, d approaching the situation in a detached and uncommitted frame of mind, would have put his questions to the signatories when the Karak cheque was actually tendered.

There remains the question what damage, if any, was suffered by Karak in consequence of the bank's failure to perform its duty to enquire. This must depend on what one supposes would have been the answers to questions never in fact put.

'If enquiry ought to be made, and no enquiry is made, then the weight of authority establishes, in my view, that it is to be assumed that a true answer would be given; and, if no enquiry is made, that negligence is established.'

f I do not think that this is to be read as meaning that there is an irrebuttable presumption that truthful answers would have been given to the questions put, and counsel for [Karak] expressly disclaimed such a proposition. I have seen a copy of the transcript of part of the argument in the Selangor case¹³ and it is clear that counsel for the District Bank and the Bank of Nova Scotia conceded, without argument, that it was to be assumed for the purposes of that case that if an enquiry had been made, an honest answer would have been given. In my view it is clearly open to Barclays

g Bank to prove if it can that, on a balance of probabilities, enquiries would have produced answers acceptable to a reasonable banker, so that the failure to enquire led to no loss to Karak: see *Cummings (or McWilliams) v Sir William Arrol & Co Ltd*¹⁴. That was an appeal from the Court of Session in an action by the widow of an employee killed in circumstances in which it was claimed that there was a breach of a statutory duty on the employer to provide safety equipment for the employee's use. It was h held that the onus was on the pursuer to establish not only the breach of duty but also the causal connection between the breach and the injury. It is sufficient for me to read a short passage from the speech of Lord Reid¹⁵:

j 'If I prove that my breach of duty in no way caused or contributed to the accident I cannot be liable in damages. And if the accident would have happened in just the same way whether or not I fulfilled my duty, it is obvious that my failure to fulfil my duty cannot have caused or contributed to it. No reason has ever been suggested why a defender should be barred from proving that his fault, whether common law negligence or breach of statutory duty, had nothing to do with the accident.' a

It seems to me that this principle must equally apply to the law of contract. The onus of proving the causal connection lies on Karak. The emphasis is put the other way in the passage I have quoted because, if a statute requires a safety device, one would start with the assumption that it is of some use, that a reasonable employee would use it, and that the employee in question was a reasonable man. So the onus of proof will soon shift in a case such as that. b

In my judgment the answers which would probably have been given by Mr Burden and Mr Cross, had they been questioned, are unlikely to have satisfied a reasonable banker that the Karak cheque represented money about to be applied for the purposes of the company. A few simple questions would merely have served to confirm the reasonable banker's suspicion that the money was not being so applied. On a balance of probabilities I am of the opinion that a reasonable banker of reasonable intelligence, undistracted by any anxiety for his own personal position, would have soon learned that the function of the Barclays draft was to cover payment for shares, and that the function of the Karak cheque was to cover payment for the Barclays draft. And so the fraud would have been exposed. The inevitable result would have been that a reasonable banker performing his contractual duty of care towards Karak, would have declined to write out the Karak cheque in favour of Barclays Bank and to tender it for the signatures of Mr Burden and Mr Cross, or to debit such a cheque to the account of Karak. c

In my judgment the case against Barclays Bank in negligence is proved. The quantum of damages is the loss suffered by Karak. This may not be the full amount of the Karak cheque insofar as those who have suffered are confined to creditors and non-assenting shareholders. This may have to be the subject-matter of further argument. d

My decision on the claim in contract is sufficient to dispose of the case so far as this court is concerned. I have, however, heard a full argument on the question of constructive trusteeship, and I must deal with that topic as well. e

I must first touch on Karak's claim against the trustee in bankruptcy of Mr Burden and Mr Cross. These claims have not been actively fought. I deal with them at this stage because the quality of the conduct of Mr Burden and Mr Cross is decisive of the question whether the claim against Barclays Bank in constructive trusteeship is capable of succeeding; that claim is based on the existence of their fraud and dishonesty. Karak pleads that Mr Burden and Mr Cross procured that the amount of the Karak cheque should be misapplied in bad faith in providing out of Karak's money the purchase price of the 40,804 shares and the expenses incidental to that purchase. In my judgment, on the evidence I have heard, and quite apart from admissions by Mr Burden and Mr Cross to which I will refer later, it is plain beyond the possibility of argument to the contrary that Mr Burden, in deliberate and conscious fraud, procured that £99,504 10s 6d of Karak's money, that is to say, the amount of the Karak cheque, should be misapplied in financing the purchase of the Karak shares so as to be lost to Karak, and that Mr Cross, either knowingly or recklessly, was implicated in that fraudulent and dishonest design. I did not understand counsel on behalf of Barclays Bank, to seek to argue otherwise. f

It is convenient to make an initial distinction between (i) a person who is a constructive trustee because (although not nominated as a trustee) he has received trust property with actual or constructive notice that it is trust property transferred in breach of trust, or because (not being a bona fide purchaser for value without notice) he acquires notice subsequent to such receipt and then deals with the property in a manner inconsistent with the trust, and (ii) a person who has not received and become chargeable with trust property in that manner but whom equity nevertheless g a fixes with liability as a constructive trustee on account of assistance which he has rendered to a breach of trust. This is not intended to be an exhaustive definition of constructive trusteeship, but to distinguish two categories thereof. There is included in the second category of constructive trusteeship the duly appointed agent of the trustees who is in receipt of trust property solely by virtue of the existence of such agency but who, by assisting in a breach of trust at the direction of trustees, is fixed with liability as a constructive trustee. The two categories are conveniently labelled in b Snell's Principles of Equity¹⁶ with the catch-phrases 'knowing receipt or dealing' and 'knowing assistance', which seem to me an admirable shorthand description of their different natures.

c The question of law which arises is: in what circumstances will a court of equity treat the second category of person as a trustee in order to provide an equitable remedy against that person on account of conduct which a court of equity considers unconscionable?

d It is common ground that directors of a company, although not trustees in the strictest sense of that expression, are to be considered and treated as trustees of money which comes to their hands or is under their control. The fact that they are to be considered and treated as trustees bears on the question whether the imposition of the equitable remedy of constructive trusteeship is available against those who have dealings with them. It is also common ground that a bank is not a trustee for its customer of the amount to his credit in his account. In the result, Mr Burden and Mr Cross are to be considered and treated as trustees in relation to the sum of money comprised in the Chartered cheque and paid into Karak's account with Barclays Bank, and Barclays Bank is to be considered and treated as the agent of such trustees.

e The conclusion of law reached by the learned judge in the Selangor case¹⁷, in relation to the second category of constructive trustees, was as follows: (1) strangers who act as the agents of trustees are liable as constructive trustees if they 'assist with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees'; (2)¹⁸

f 'The knowledge required to hold a stranger liable as constructive trustee in a dishonest and fraudulent design, is knowledge of circumstances which would indicate to an honest, reasonable man that such a design was being committed or would put him on enquiry, which the stranger failed to make, whether it was being committed.'

(3) What is 'a dishonest and fraudulent design' is to be judged¹⁹:

g '... according to "the plain principles of a court of equity" ... The governing consideration is to give effect to equitable rights, where it is not inequitable to do so, and when knowledge of the existence of those rights is material to granting equitable relief. In general, at any rate, it is equitable that a person with actual notice or constructive notice of those rights should be fixed with knowledge of them. This is in a context of producing equitable results in a civil action and not in the context of criminal liability.'

h These conclusions were reached after consideration of a large number of authorities, ranging in time from the decision of Leach V-C in 1819 in *Keane v Roberts*²⁰ down to the decision of the Privy Council in *Bank of New South Wales v Goulburn Valley Butter Co Proprietary Ltd*¹.

The formulation in the Selangor case² of the law applicable to the second category of constructive trusteeship is based on the judgment of Lord Selborne LC in 1874 in *Barnes v Addy*³ with which James and Mellish LJJ concurred. This was a case in which beneficiaries unsuccessfully sued solicitors who had been associated with the fraud of the trustee; it was found that the solicitors had no knowledge or suspicion of the fraud and that there was nothing to lead them to suppose that a fraud was intended. The test of liability (which it may be convenient to call the *Barnes v Addy*³ formula), in the words of Lord Selborne LC, was that⁴:

'they assist with knowledge in a dishonest and fraudulent design on the part of the trustees.'

This was paraphrased with approval by Lord Esher MR in *Soar v Ashwell*⁵ (a first category case) as:

'... he has knowingly assisted a nominated trustee in a fraudulent and dishonest disposition of the trust property.'

The point on which the authorities were obscure, until the Selangor case⁶, was what degree of 'knowledge' was required to satisfy that test. A person may have knowledge of an existing fact because in a subjective sense he is actually aware of that fact. In an appropriate context a court of law may attribute knowledge of an existing fact to that person because in a subjective sense he has knowledge of circumstances which would lead a postulated man to the conclusion that the fact exists or which would put a postulated man on enquiry whether the fact exists.

The claim against the District Bank was that it knew, or as a reasonable banker ought to have known, that Selangor's money was being applied for the purpose of giving financial assistance in connection with the purchase by Cradock of Selangor stock. It was not pleaded that the District Bank ought to have made enquiries. The decision, which went against the District Bank on constructive trusteeship as it did in negligence, was based on proof of facts which would have brought home the knowledge of such misapplication to the mind of a reasonable banker.

Counsel for Barclays Bank attacked the statement of law in the Selangor case⁶ principally on two grounds: (1) that it was inconsistent with the ratio decidendi of and was impliedly overruled by the decision of the Court of Appeal in *Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v Herbert Smith & Co*⁷, and (2) because important and decisive cases were not brought to the attention of the learned judge.

It will be observed that, according to the Selangor case⁶, an objective test is to be applied both in assessing the defendant's 'knowledge' and in assessing the character of the 'design'. Counsel for Barclays Bank, in an argument of great penetration, accepted the objective test in relation to the 'design' but not in relation to 'knowledge'. There is no such thing, he submitted, as constructive trusteeship of the category with which this case is concerned, based on the defendant's constructive knowledge of facts as distinct from his actual knowledge of facts or knowledge which has to be imputed to him because he has closed his eyes with the deliberate intention of avoiding actual knowledge; counsel bracketed actual knowledge with imputed knowledge in that special sense. He said that a defendant is not to be fixed with liability as a constructive trustee of the second category unless he has been guilty of a lack of probity, which he likened to moral obliquity or dishonesty or bad faith or fraud. The test is subjective to this extent, that the court must first assess the acts, the knowledge and the intention of the defendant, and by knowledge is meant actual or imputed knowledge but not constructive knowledge. These subjective matters are then to be submitted a to the objective test of the accepted moral standard of the community and adjudged accordingly. In other words, the defendant is not liable as a constructive trustee if he had no actual or imputed knowledge of the design and did not intend to participate in it; on the other hand, he cannot successfully defend a claim by saying that he knew of the design but did not regard it as dishonest. Unless, it is submitted, a subjective test is applied to the acts, knowledge and intention of the defendant, it is not possible to charge him with that lack of probity which is the foundation of a stranger's liability as a constructive trustee. It is important to an understanding of this argument to appreciate the special sense given to the expression 'imputed knowledge', which in counsel's formulation is brought about by the deliberate shutting of eyes so as to avoid actual knowledge.

c The Carl-Zeiss case⁸ was a dispute between the Carl-Zeiss company of Jena ('the East German foundation') and the Carl-Zeiss company of Württemberg ('the West German foundation'). In the main action the East German foundation claimed, inter alia, that the assets of the West German foundation, including its property in England, were held by that foundation in trust for the East German foundation. The East German foundation later issued a writ against the current and former solicitors of the West German foundation claiming that when they were put in funds by their client, they had notice, via the East German foundation's pleadings in the main action and from other material, that such money belonged to the East German foundation, and it was said that the solicitors were accountable accordingly. The matter came on for trial as a preliminary issue.

e The East German foundation based its claim on a submission that a man who receives trust property which he knows or ought to know is trust property and applies that property in a manner which he knows or ought to know is inconsistent with the terms of the trust, is accountable at the suit of the beneficiaries under that trust. The submission failed, on the ground that the solicitors only had knowledge of a disputed claim that the assets of the West German foundation were trust property; they did not have knowledge that such assets were in fact trust property. Danckwerts LJ expressed his conclusion as follows⁹:

f '... claims are not the same thing as facts. . . . What we have to deal with is the state of the defendants' knowledge (actual or imputed) at the date when they received payments of their costs and disbursements. At that date they cannot have had more than knowledge of the claims above mentioned. It was not possible for them to know whether they were well founded or not . . . Consequently, it seems to me that the plaintiff's claim against the defendant solicitors must fail on the requisite condition of knowledge or notice.'

g Sachs LJ said¹⁰:

h 'First, and to my mind decisively, whatever be the nature of the knowledge or notice required, cognisance of what has been termed a "doubtful equity" is not enough.'

Later, after discussing the relevance of constructive notice in the sense of s 199 of the Law of Property Act 1925, he added¹¹:

i 'As at present advised, I am inclined to the view that a further element has to be proved, at any rate in a case such as the present one. That element is one of dishonesty or of consciously acting improperly, as opposed to an innocent failure to make what a court may later decide to have been proper enquiry. That would entail both actual knowledge of the trust's existence and actual knowledge that what is being done is improperly in breach of that trust—though, of course, in both cases a person wilfully shutting his eyes to the obvious is in no different position than if he had kept them open.’

Then, after referring to the Selangor case¹² and certain other authorities, he added¹³:

‘Out of deference to the conclusions reached by UNGOED-THOMAS, J., and to the fact that the Selangor case¹² is under appeal, it now seems best, however, for me not to state a final view in this matter, especially when the instant case concerns agents who may thus be in a different position from other strangers.’

It is plain that he was not expressing any decided opinion on this point. Lastly, I quote from the judgment of Edmund Davies LJ¹⁴:

‘The concept of “want of probity” appears to provide a useful touchstone in considering circumstances said to give rise to constructive trusts, and I have not found it misleading when applying it to the many authorities cited to this court. It is because of such a concept that evidence as to “good faith”, “knowledge” and “notice” plays so important a part in the reported decisions. It is true that not every situation where probity is lacking gives rise to a constructive trust. Nevertheless, the authorities appear to show that nothing short of it will do.’

Then, after having cited two cases, he said that they were¹⁵—

‘but two illustrations among many to be found in the reports of that want of probity which, to my way of thinking, is the hallmark of constructive trusts, however created.’

The Selangor case¹² was certainly not expressly overruled by the Carl-Zeiss case¹⁶. It was not even referred to in the judgments of Danckwerts and Edmund Davies LJ. Nor do I think that it was overruled by necessary implication. Counsel for Barclays Bank submitted that Danckwerts LJ used the expression ‘imputed knowledge’ in his own sense of wilful shutting of eyes as distinct from knowledge which is to be attributed to the defendant because a reasonable person would have drawn the inference or would have been put on enquiry. I do not read his words in that sense, nor does it seem consistent with his later reference to ‘the requisite condition of knowledge or notice’.

I agree with counsel that the judgment of Edmund Davies LJ might be read as supporting his proposition. But in the end the ratio decidendi of that judgment appears to be the same as that of the other judgments, namely¹⁷:

‘... mere notice of a claim asserted by a third party is insufficient to render the agent guilty of a wrongful act in dealing with property derived from his principal in accordance with the latter’s instructions unless the agent knows that the third party’s claim is well founded and that the principal accordingly had no authority to give such instructions.’

Accordingly I reject the submission that the *Selangor*¹² judgment on constructive trusteeship is inconsistent with the ratio decidendi of the Carl-Zeiss case¹⁶.

In support of his proposition that lack of probity is an essential ingredient of the second category of constructive trusteeship, counsel for Barclays Bank also referred a me to five pre-Keane v Roberts¹⁸ cases. These were Nugent v Gifford¹⁹, Mead v Lord Orrery²⁰, Scott v Tyler¹, Hill v Simpson² and McLeod v Drummond³. It may well be that these cases are consistent with the proposition that fraud or what is tantamount to fraud must be found before an agent who has not intermeddled is rendered accountable as a constructive trustee. They are not, in my view, decisive against the relevance of an objective test, that is to say, whether the circumstances would have indicated a dishonest and fraudulent design to a reasonable man or have put him on enquiry. It must, I think, be remembered that equitable doctrines have developed over the passage of time and it would not be right to assume that principles expressed two centuries ago were being fully and exhaustively enunciated for all ages to come.

b Counsel for Barclays Bank took me with great care and patience through most of the authorities cited by the learned judge on constructive trusteeship, in order to convince me that they were consistent with his proposition of law. I do not think that any useful purpose would be served by my subjecting these authorities to a critical analysis of my own. That, in my view, is an exercise to be performed elsewhere if it is to be performed at all. I shall however refer to one of counsel's new authorities, Williams v Williams⁴, in detail. This was a case which was referred to by all the learned Lords Justices in the Carl-Zeiss case⁵, but was not read to the learned judge in the Selangor case⁶. It is described in the reports of the Carl-Zeiss case⁷ as 'a case cited in the Selangor⁶ judgment' but this is clearly a misprint for 'a case not cited in the Selangor⁶ judgment'. It was much stressed in argument on behalf of Barclays Bank. The facts in Williams v Williams⁴ were these. Edward Williams married in 1863 in India. He made a marriage settlement, which was executed by him and his wife. By the settlement he conveyed his undivided share in certain land to trustees in trust for himself for life, with remainder to his wife for life, with remainder to the children of the marriage. The settlement was handed over to the wife. The parties returned to England. The husband had occasion to consult a solicitor, Mr Cheese, about his will. Mr Cheese asked the husband if there were a marriage settlement, and the husband assured him there was none. Something, the husband said, had been prepared but it arrived too late for execution. In 1868 the land was partitioned, and some 700 acres were conveyed to the husband. In 1869 the husband sold part of the land. Mr Cheese acted as his solicitor. The purchase money was about £8,000 and was used to pay the husband's debts. Six years later the husband asked his wife for the settlement. He gave her some excuse, and she handed it to him. The settlement was never seen again. In 1877 the husband made another will. He appointed the wife his sole executrix and gave her a life interest, with remainder to the children. In 1879 he died. The wife, as his executrix, sold the remainder of the land in lots, Mr Cheese acting as her solicitor. The land realised about £3,500. In 1880, in the course of dealing with a requisition which had been raised by a purchaser, Mr Wood, a clerk in Mr Cheese's office, wrote to the wife and enquired if there was a settlement. The wife replied that there was, and enclosed a note made by the solicitors who had prepared it. Mr Wood reported this to Mr Cheese, but did not show him the wife's letter or the note enclosed with it. Mr Cheese answered that 'it was all nonsense, that she was referring to a promise only, and that there had been no settlement'. Later, a copy or draft of the settlement was found. Mr Cheese had used half the proceeds of sale to pay the husband's debts including some money due to himself. The remainder of the money remained intact. The children of the marriage sued the wife, the trustees of the marriage settlement and Mr Cheese. The claim against Mr Cheese was that he might be declared liable to account for and make good 'the purchase-money arising from the sale of the hereditaments comprised in the indenture of settlement received and disposed of by him with notice of the trusts of the said indenture'. Two matters were conceded. First, it was admitted that Mr Cheese had no wrong motive in anything which he did. Secondly, it was admitted that notice to Mr Wood of the wife's claim that a settlement existed would not of itself be notice to Mr Cheese. It was held that Mr Cheese did not have such notice of the settlement as to be treated constructively as a trustee, so as to be liable for money which had passed through his hands.

Counsel for Barclays Bank argued that this case was an authority, not cited to the learned judge in the Selangor case⁸, that an agent or other stranger to the trust is not liable as constructive trustee unless he has actual knowledge of the facts or has shut his eyes against acquiring knowledge of the truth. He relied particularly on a passage which I will read⁹:

'I am not now dealing with the question whether Mr. Cheese was negligent in his duty as solicitor. That I take to be a perfectly separate and distinct question. Whether he did his duty as solicitor to Mrs. Williams, or was negligent in that duty, is, I think, a very different question from the question whether he had such notice as to make his concurring as her solicitor in the sales of the property and allowing the money to pass through his hands sufficient to affect him personally so as to make him liable to repay the money. The case, again, would have been different if I had been satisfied that Mr. Cheese had wilfully shut his eyes—if there had been any motive whatever fairly suggested for supposing that Mr. Cheese was desirous of thinking that there was no settlement. If it were proved to me upon the evidence that he had wilfully shut his eyes, and was determined not to inquire, then the case would have been very different.'

In my opinion, *Williams v Williams*¹⁰ has no relevance at all to the case before me. In the case with which I am dealing, the plaintiff is relying exclusively on the *Barnes v Addy*¹¹ formula as interpreted in the Selangor case⁸. It is fundamental to that species of constructive trusteeship that the stranger who is sued has knowingly assisted a trustee in a fraudulent and dishonest disposition of the trust property. The wife in *Williams v Williams*¹⁰ was not a trustee of the settlement, and even if she were to be treated as such by virtue of some extension of the *Barnes v Addy*¹¹ principle, she certainly was not engaged in a dishonest and fraudulent design or in a dishonest and fraudulent disposition of the trust property. Furthermore, it is to my mind reasonably clear that the type of notice, the existence of which Kay J was concerned to decide about, was not confined to actual notice, but extended to constructive notice to be ascertained by reference to an objective test. After considering the husband's assertion of no settlement, and the long course of dealing with the property on the basis of no settlement, Kay J said¹²:

'Mr. Cheese, therefore, had a right, I think, under these circumstances, to be very strongly of opinion that there was no settlement at all . . . If he had, as a I believe he had, a bonâ fide conviction that there was no settlement whatever... if that was the impression on his mind—I think it was reasonable under the circumstances that that impression should continue, and that he should give to Mr. Wood the answer he gave, and I cannot hold that he is affected with such notice as to make him personally liable for the purchase-moneys which passed through his hands as solicitor.’

b Whatever *Williams v Williams*¹³ may be authority for, it is certainly not authority that in the context of a claim based on the *Barnes v Addy*¹⁴ formula, knowledge means actual knowledge as distinct from constructive knowledge.

In my view, *Williams v Williams*¹³ on a proper analysis was a case concerned with the first rather than the second category of constructive trusteeship. The claim against Mr Cheese was that trust money was wrongfully in his hands by the direction of one c who had no title thereto and that he proceeded to dispose of it in defiance of the beneficiaries’ title of which he had been given due notice. That is not the type of case with which the second category of constructive trusteeship is concerned. The same observation applies to the Carl-Zeiss case¹⁵.

I take this opportunity to record that I asked counsel for Karak whether he based his claim to any extent on the first category of constructive trusteeship, having regard d to the fact that the Karak cheque was made payable to Barclays Bank and was endorsed by Barclays Bank and credited to Minorities, so that in that sense the trust money passed through the hands of Barclays Bank. Counsel told me that the claim against Barclays Bank in the context of constructive trusteeship was based exclusively on the second category of constructive trusteeship, that is to say, on the *Barnes v Addy*¹⁴ formula, where it is fundamental to find the existence of a dishonest and e fraudulent design on the part of the trustees.

I respectfully agree with the explanation of the *Barnes v Addy*¹⁴ formula which I find in the *Selangor*¹⁶ judgment. If, as seems to be established by the cases, an objective test of ‘knowledge’ is rightly applied in the context of the first category of constructive trusteeship (see, for example, *Reckitt v Barnett*¹⁷ and *Nelson v Larholt*¹⁸), I do not myself f see any particular logic in denying it a similar role in the context of the second category of constructive trusteeship. To borrow the words of Lord Cranworth, spoken admittedly in a different context, ‘Constructive notice is as good as any notice, if it does amount to notice’¹⁹.

Applying the *Barnes v Addy*¹⁴ formula, as explained in the Selangor case¹⁶, I reach the conclusion, for reasons already indicated in dealing with the claim in negligence, that a reasonable banker would have been put on enquiry as to the propriety of the g Karak cheque and that such enquiry would in all probability have revealed the impropriety. So I find the claim against Barclays Bank made good in equity as in contract. I do not consider, because it is unnecessary, whether the circumstances known to Mr Cooper or Mr Hockley would have brought the dishonest and fraudulent design home to the mind of a reasonable man, as distinct from putting him on enquiry.

h I turn to the relief sought against the trustee in bankruptcy of Mr Burden and against Mr Cross. Replacement is sought not only of the amount of the Karak cheque but also of the sum of £1,750 paid to Stanley Stewart & Co Ltd by cheque dated 17th February 1959, and cleared on 19th February. Mr Burden admitted in a statement made before an examiner on 5th July 1961 that the £99,504 10s 6d was transferred to Minorities to enable the assenting shareholders to be paid, and that the £1,750 represented a fee paid by Karak for the introduction to Contanglo. No other explanation has been forthcoming from Mr Cross, nor is there any evidence that those moneys were used for Karak's benefit. In these circumstances, Karak has a claim against both parties for the replacement of such sums with interest. I will hear counsel for Karak on the exact terms of the order which ought to be made against the trustee in bankruptcy and against Mr Cross.

Sale of land – Vendor's lien – Subrogation – Mortgage – Provision of purchase money by mortgagee – Execution of valid charge in favour of mortgagee – Remortgage of property to second mortgagee – Sum advanced by second mortgagee used to discharge debt to first mortgagee – Second mortgage invalid and unenforceable – Whether vendor's lien extinguished on execution of valid charge in favour of first mortgagee – Whether second mortgagee entitled by subrogation to vendor's lien.

The defendants agreed to purchase certain property for £2,750 and for this purpose negotiated a loan of £1,500 from T I Ltd. It was agreed that the loan would be repayable by instalments and secured by a charge on the property which was being purchased. In June 1964 the defendants' solicitors received the £1,500 from T I Ltd. On 19th June the purchase was completed, the charge executed in favour of T I Ltd and the sum of £1,500 was handed over by the solicitors to the vendor in part payment of the purchase price. The defendants subsequently fell into arrears with their repayments and in consequence their solicitors negotiated a remortgage of the property with the plaintiffs who were registered moneylenders. In due course the solicitors received £1,600 from the plaintiffs which they held pending the completion of the remortgage. In June 1966 the defendants executed a second legal charge in favour of the plaintiffs. Three days later, at the request of the defendants, the solicitors paid the sum of £1,521 to the account of T I Ltd in discharge of the 1964 charge. This sum was paid out of the £1,600 which the solicitors had been given to hold on behalf of the plaintiffs. The defendants again fell into arrears. The plaintiffs brought proceedings for the recovery of the outstanding balance of the sum advanced. It was common ground that the loan agreement of 1966 and the legal charge thereunder were illegal and unenforceable under the provisions of the Moneylenders Act 1927.

Held – The plaintiffs were entitled to recover the moneys advanced to the defendants for the following reasons—

(i) when T I Ltd paid to the vendor £1,500 in part satisfaction of the purchase money, they secured thereby a lien to the sum by subrogation to the vendor; that lien was not automatically extinguished when they secured a charge on the property purchased; it followed that, when the plaintiffs discharged the defendants' debt to T I Ltd, they in turn acquired by subrogation such protection, including the lien, as T I Ltd would have had (see p 1247 h and p 1248 b, post); Nottingham Permanent Benefit

- (ii) alternatively, since on the facts the money had been advanced by the plaintiffs in order to pay off the money lent by T I Ltd as mortgagees, the plaintiffs became equitable assignees of the mortgagee and therefore were entitled to have the mortgage kept alive for their benefit and to enforce the mortgagee's rights thereunder (see p 1248 c and g, post).

Adjourned summons

By an originating summons dated 15th December 1969, the plaintiffs, Coptic Ltd, claimed against the defendants, Stanford Washington Bailey and Gloria Iona Bailey, inter alia, payment of all moneys due to the plaintiffs under a legal charge dated 19th June 1966 made between the defendants and the plaintiffs, foreclosure or sale of the property comprised in the legal charge, and delivery by the defendants to the plaintiffs of possession of the property. The defendants counterclaimed for delivery up by the plaintiffs of the legal charge and all documents of title to the property in question held by the plaintiffs. The facts are set out in the judgment.

- f J R McDonald for the plaintiffs.
E C Evans-Lombe for the defendants.

WHITFORD J. The facts in this matter are really not in issue, but must be recited. In April 1964 the first defendant in these proceedings entered into a contract to buy certain property at Littlebury Road, London, from a person who has been referred to as the vendor, for a sum of £2,750, and the first defendant paid the usual deposit to a firm of estate agents who were acting as agents. Davies, Arnold & Cooper were acting as solicitors for the defendants in this purchase, and to enable the purchase to take place they negotiated a loan of £1,500 for the defendants from a company of the name of Thulium Investments Ltd. There was an agreement that this loan should be repaid over a period of years by certain monthly instalments and that the loan should be secured by a charge on the property being purchased.

On 29th May 1964 the solicitors received the sum of £1,500 from Thulium and the defendants executed the legal charge, on 19th June, in favour of Thulium. On the same day the contract was completed. On completion, the solicitors for the defendants handed to the vendor's solicitors a draft for the purchase moneys outstanding, which included the whole of the £1,500 which the solicitors had received from Thulium, and it is said that this sum was paid by the solicitors as agents for Thulium.

The sale having been completed, the position then arose that the defendants should have repaid, by monthly instalments, the sum which they had borrowed, but they fell into arrears. As a result of this, it was agreed that the solicitors should negotiate a remortgage of the property with the plaintiffs in these proceedings.

In June 1966 the solicitors received £1,600 from the plaintiffs, which they held pending the completion of the remortgage. On 19th June 1966 the defendants executed the second legal charge ('the 1966 charge') in favour of the plaintiffs. This charge was executed pursuant to an agreement of loan contained in a memorandum dated 19th June 1966, made between the plaintiffs and the defendants.

On 22nd June 1966 the solicitors paid the sum of £1,521 15s to the account of Thulium, at the request of the defendants, in discharge of the 1964 charge, and the remortgage was completed. It is accepted that this sum paid into Thulium's account, was paid out of the £1,600 which the solicitors had been given to hold on behalf of the plaintiffs. The 1966 arrangement provided for the repayment of the moneys lent by the plaintiffs at a rather higher rate, and the defendants again fell into arrears. They have altogether, under the 1964 and 1966 charges, repaid a total of £288 5s.

Now the plaintiffs in these proceedings are registered moneylenders, and it arose at an early stage and was asserted by the defendants that the loan agreement of 1966 and the legal charge given thereunder were illegal and unenforceable under the provisions of the Moneylenders Act 1927. The defendants counterclaim for delivery up by the plaintiffs of the legal charge and all documents of title to the property in question held by the plaintiffs.

The reasons why it was asserted that the loan agreement and the legal charge were illegal and unenforceable were set out in an affidavit filed on behalf of the defendants, which I have not been taken through in detail because it was accepted, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that the defendants' contentions on this point were good. They turn on certain points which, having regard to the fact that the plaintiffs are moneylenders, make it impossible for them to enforce the agreement and the charge. Perhaps the most relevant contention and the only one which was accepted by the plaintiffs was the defendants' contention that the memorandum of agreement did not contain all the terms of the agreement. Faced with this situation, the plaintiffs sought to secure leave to amend their pleadings and they now seek to recover the sum which was paid to secure the release of the charge in favour of Thulium, on the basis of a lien. They put the case in two ways. In the end, I think that whichever way it is put, they rely on the decision of the Court of Appeal in *Congresbury Motors Ltd v Anglo-Belge Finance Co Ltd*¹. Now that was a case where the defendant moneylenders advanced moneys for the purchase of certain premises, and on completion took a mortgage which was held unenforceable by the provisions of s 6 of the Moneylenders Act 1927. It was, however, held at first instance and confirmed on appeal that the defendants were entitled, by subrogation, to the vendor's lien and that such subrogation was neither in conflict with the Moneylenders Acts nor the policy behind them.

In the judgment in the Court of Appeal it was pointed out that the court is not concerned with the ethical merits on the one hand of a party who hopes to be able to establish a clear title secured with somebody else's money, or on the other hand of a person who advances money without securing the basis for repayment. The court pointed out that it was concerned with the position in law. No doubt, if the plaintiffs fail to establish a lien in this case, the defendants will have got their property, in some measure at least, at the plaintiffs' expense, and persons who operate a business of the type operated by the plaintiffs and no doubt are able to secure, but do not in fact secure, advice as to how they should conduct their business, are, having regard to the impact of statutory provisions on their business, put at some risk.

The Congresbury case¹ was one in which the court was concerned with a single transaction between the moneylenders and the company to whom the property was conveyed. As I have said, it was a case in which the defendants were the moneylenders. The plaintiffs initiated their proceedings for the purpose of securing certain declarations. The Court of Appeal followed, by analogy, a decision of the House of Lords in a

a case of *Nottingham Permanent Benefit Building Society v Thurstan*². The facts of the case are summarised in the Court of Appeal judgment in the Congresbury case³, in the following terms:

b 'That case involved the Infants Relief Act 1874. A married female member of a building society wanted a loan to acquire a property on which her builder husband proposed to erect houses for sale at profit. She was, unknown to the building society, an infant. She arranged for a loan to enable her to acquire the land, which cost £250, from the building society. The transaction was put through by payment by the lenders direct to the vendors of the purchase price, a mortgage being granted by the borrower. Subsequently further moneys were advanced on the mortgage to enable buildings to be erected. The building society later discovered that she was an infant, discontinued advances, took possession of the property and completed houses on it. On attaining 21, the borrower asserted that the mortgage was void against her under s 1 of the Infants Relief Act 1874, and claimed delivery up of the mortgage deed and title deeds and possession of the land. It was held that the mortgage was void and must be delivered up; that the building society had no lien on the title deeds for money expended by it on building on the land or for money advanced for such building to the borrower; but that it had such a lien for the £250 paid, on her behalf, to the vendor for the purchase price because, but for that payment, the vendor would have had an unpaid vendor's lien, and the building society was entitled by subrogation to the same lien together with all the remedies inherent in it.'

e Now, that again was a case where in substance there was a single transaction to be considered. The present case, so far as the plaintiffs' position is concerned, is really removed one stage from the Congresbury case⁴. They say that Thulium enjoyed a vendor's lien by subrogation and when they, at the defendants' request, paid out Thulium, there was a subrogation to the lien which Thulium themselves, by subrogation, enjoyed.

f The defendants say that there is a vital distinction in the present case because *Congresbury*⁴ was decided on the basis that there never was an effective mortgage—indeed, there could not have been an effective mortgage—because of the provisions in the Monelenders Act 1927 and the nature of the agreement which had been entered into. In the present case, the defendants, by contrast, say that there was never anything ineffective about the security which Thulium got and that because, at the time when the charge in favour of Thulium was executed, the vendor's lien was extinguished, Thulium never got a vendor's lien by subrogation, and if that be right then it is impossible that any such lien should pass to the plaintiffs. The defendants rely on *Capital Finance Co Ltd v Stokes*⁵ referred to at the end of the *Congresbury*⁴ judgment and distinguished on the basis that the Capital Finance case⁵ was a case in which there was an effective charge which only became ineffective when, after the expiry of 21 days, it had not been registered as required by certain relevant provisions of the Companies Act 1948.

h It is necessary to consider the way in which the Court of Appeal dealt with the facts of the Congresbury case⁴ and I would turn first to the passage where, having considered the Thurstan case², the Court of Appeal considered the impact of the case on the matters then before them. They said⁶:

i 'It was submitted to us in argument that a distinction existed in that in Thurstan's case² the lender was ignorant of the fact of infancy, whereas the moneylender in the present case must be assumed to know that a condition precedent to the enforceability of the obligation to repay (and the security) had not been fulfilled. It was, it was said, the moneylender's fault that it failed in its attempt to secure a contract for repayment of the loan and a valid security therefor. We observe the difference but do not accept that it is a relevant distinction; and if we observe that an accusation of fault comes ill from a litigant avowedly devoid of ethical merit it must not be thought that this has blinded us to a genuine distinction. An alternative submission was made to us—although we believe it was not made below, and it is not to be found in the grounds of appeal. This was that, assuming that for a moment of time that theoretically elapsed between the completion of the purchase and the completion of the mortgage there was a subrogation to the vendor's lien, the acceptance of the legal mortgage waived or abandoned or superseded or caused a merger of the lien. The short answer in our view is that the same point, if valid, was applicable in Thurstan's case⁷. To this it was replied that in that case the security was by statute expressed to be void, while here it is expressed to be unenforceable. We see no relevant distinction, particularly when it is for the court to take the point on the pleadings which must show, as could not here be done, that the relevant condition precedent to enforceability was not fulfilled. In each case the security is ineffective, and in our view ineffective for all purposes, including any question of nullifying the lien by subrogation. If indeed it is justly said that the moneylender is deemed to know of the defect in the mortgage, it may equally be said to be deemed not to waive or abandon the lien. Move into the world of deeming and the results may be unforeseen.

It is perhaps also relevant at this stage to consider what was said in the Capital Finance case⁸, where the same question arose, but in slightly different circumstances, because there it was not a question of some third party having a lien by subrogation, but whether the vendor did or did not have an unpaid vendor's lien and having, in the circumstances of that case, at one stage, taken moneys and subsequently a charge to secure his interest. Harman LJ said⁹:

'The remaining and most serious question is whether the first defendant did not have an unpaid vendor's lien. Such a lien arises in the ordinary course in favour of a vendor who has not received the purchase money and it is the creature of the law and does not depend on contract or possession. It depends on the fact that the vendor has a right to specific performance of his contract. The existence of the lien, however, depends on the terms of the bargain between the parties and on the surrounding circumstances and may be excluded, as is pointed out in SNELL'S PRINCIPLES OF EQUITY¹⁰: "As soon as a binding contract of sale is made, the vendor has a lien on the property for the purchase-money and a right to retain the property until the money is paid . . . Occasionally, however, the vendor will have no lien. If he receives all that he bargained for, e.g., if he sells the property in consideration of the purchaser giving him a promissory note or a bond to pay him an annuity, and a promissory note or bond is duly given, there will be no lien on the property sold, even though the note is not met at maturity or the annuity is not paid. Moreover, the nature of the contract may exclude the vendor's lien, as where the existence of a lien would prevent the purchaser from selling the property, or where the intention of the parties is that the purchaser shall resell or mortgage the property and pay off the vendor out of the proceeds . . ." It was held by PENNYCUICK, J., here that the terms of the contract did exclude a lien in this case. The circumstances relied on were first, that the first defendant contracted for a legal charge for the balance of the purchase a money and that he got; secondly, that the existence of the equitable charge arising as above described left "no room" (in the judge's words) for a vendor's lien; and thirdly, that the terms of cl. 14 of the contract showed that it was intended to pay off the first defendant out of the proceeds of the sale of lots and that this process would be inconsistent with the existence of a vendor's lien. The learned judge accepted the view that the existence of the equitable mortgage

b up to the date of completion left "no room" for a vendor's lien. I do not feel able to accept this view. At the date of the contract only a part of the deposit was paid (see cl. 14 (1)) and thereafter until completion, the equitable mortgage only covered three-quarters of the purchase money and left room for a lien at least on the balance. It does seem to me, however, that this lien must be taken to have been abandoned when the contract was completed, for on the happening of that
c event the first defendant got all that he bargained for, namely one-quarter of the purchase money in cash and the balance by way of the stipulated legal charge. It seems to me that the provision for paying off the legal charge by instalments on sale of plots within two years is irrelevant and has no bearing either way because the first defendant, as legal chargee, must join in any conveyance and could refuse to concur unless paid his £600.

d It is to be observed that the Court of Appeal in *Congresbury*¹¹ said, in relation to the Capital Finance case¹²:

'We need not analyse that case too closely; it concerned (inter alia) the overriding of either a vendor's lien, or an equitable charge created by the contract for sale and purchase of land, by a legal charge which turned out to be unenforceable against the liquidator and creditors of the purchaser company for lack of registration within 21 days under s 95 of the Companies Act 1948. But there the legal
e charge was an effective charge in every respect until failure to comply with a condition subsequent, and, as against the company as a going concern, was always an effective charge. We were referred on this general point by counsel for the defendant company in rejoinder to a number of cases, but, being satisfied that the alternative way of putting the plaintiff company's case is not sustainable,

Now there is no doubt that in the Congresbury case¹³ the vendor got all that he bargained for. He was paid his money and his lien was no doubt extinguished on completion and never came into existence, because, at the moment of completion, he was fully paid off. But there still remains the question of a lien by subrogation
g and one looks not only at the vendor, who had to be considered in the Capital Finance case¹², but at the third party who provided the money for the purchase, as the House of Lords did in the Thurstan case¹⁴ and as the Court of Appeal did in the Congresbury case¹³. When Thulium paid to the vendor £1,500 in part satisfaction of the purchase money, they secured, without any other action on their part, a lien to the sum by subrogation. At the same time, they secured a charge, which, as far as anybody could
h tell at that stage, might or might not be effective to protect their interest, but which, certainly on its face—and I read the document—does not purport expressly to exclude any right they might have by way of lien. I find myself unable to come to the conclusion that it must be a necessary implication that any lien that they might otherwise have, should be extinguished.

Now counsel for the defendants in this case did not suggest that in terms the contract excluded a lien. His whole case was really based on this, that any lien there might otherwise have been, was necessarily extinguished at the moment the charge was entered. Now whatever the position may have been in the Capital Finance case¹², where, when the charge was taken by the vendor he was deemed by the Court of Appeal to have abandoned his lien, I see no reason, on the facts of the case before me, to consider that there was never at any time a lien by subrogation, and, if there was, that that lien was abandoned by Thulium by reason of the taking of the charge. a

Now if this is right, the defendants accept that when the plaintiffs discharged the defendants' debt to Thulium, they acquired, by subrogation, such protection as Thulium would have had, for the defendants did not suggest, in argument before me, that the plaintiffs' case could fail for any other reason than that there was never a lien by subrogation to Thulium. b

I think that the plaintiffs succeed in this way of putting their case. But they do also put it on an alternative basis in this way. They say that where a person advances money for a person who obtains a mortgage, and acquired money for this purpose, the person advancing the money becomes an equitable assignee of the mortgage and is entitled to have it kept alive for his benefit, and, so they say, when the plaintiffs in fact paid off Thulium as mortgagee they were entitled at least to this same interest, and on this basis should be entitled to recover the moneys which they had advanced to pay off Thulium. c

Now whilst the defendants in this case do not dispute the general proposition stated as to the equitable rights of persons paying off mortgage debts, they do say that, before a proposition of this nature can be given effect to, it is necessary that one should be able to come to the conclusion that there was in existence an agreement to provide money for the person to pay off the mortgage. They say that there is no evidence in this case that any such agreement was in existence at all and they point to the fact that the first memorandum of agreement relating to the provision by the plaintiffs of the moneys that they have paid was in 1966 and it can be read from end to end without finding any reference to the facts that the money to be advanced was to be used for the particular purpose of paying off the mortgage or indeed for any other purpose. Counsel for the plaintiffs says that it is rather strange that the defendants at one time suggest you must find spelt out in the document such rights as the plaintiffs might have had under the 1966 agreement and charge, and on another basis argue that the agreement is bad because it does not contain all the terms agreed between the parties and that the defendants should not be heard to say, at this stage of the proceedings, that if in fact there was in existence an agreement that this money should be advanced for the purpose of paying off Thulium, then this must be found in the agreement, which it is part of the defendants' case does not set out all the terms agreed. d

There is no disagreement between the parties to the action that if money was advanced to pay off the mortgage the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment. On these facts I find the money was provided by the plaintiffs for paying off the charges in favour of Thulium, and I think that the plaintiffs are also entitled to succeed on the second way that they have put their case. In the result, the plaintiffs succeed and the defendants' counterclaim must be dismissed. f
